

THE MARSTONS.
A NOVEL.
COLLECTION
OF BRITISH AUTHORS.

VOL. 970.

THE MARSTONS BY HAMILTON AÏDÉ.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

THE MARSTONS
BY HAMILTON AÏDÉ
1858
LONDON
J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO. PUBLISHERS
15, N. 2ND ST. N. Y.

THE WEARSTONS

COLLECTION

REPTILES & AMPHIBIANS

NO. 1

THE WEARSTONS AT WASHINGTON

IN TWO VOLUMES

VOL. I

REPTILES

BY J. A. W. REYNOLDS

1890

NEW YORK: THE WEARSTONS

THE MARSTONS.

A NOVEL.

BY

HAMILTON AÏDÉ.

AUTHOR OF "RITA," "CARR OF CARRLYON."

COPYRIGHT EDITION.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

LEIPZIG

BERNHARD TAUCHNITZ

1868.

The Right of Translation is reserved.

391 - Fg.

HAMILTON AIDE

LIBRARY

IN TWO VOLUMES

VOL. I

LEUNG

BERNARD TACHNITZ

1888

THE LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

CONTENTS

OF VOLUME I

TO

THE INMATES OF THAT QUIET HOME

WHERE I STUDIED, FROM THE LIFE,

ONE PORTRAIT IN THESE PAGES,

I DEDICATE THEM

IN LOVING MEMORY OF MANY HAPPY DAYS.

— I. Changed Relations	124
— II. The New Home	128
— III. The Lodges on the First Floor	133
— IV. Dropped on the Stairs	135
— V. The Lodge on the Third Floor	141
— VI. From Jamaica to London and Back	148
— VII. Two Angels	154
— VIII. The Lost Clock	157
— IX. Mr. Thompson	174
— X. To which Two People speak ill of each other	187
— XI. Bystanding	190
— XII. How the News was received in Jamaica	209
— XIII. The Reason why Mr. Thompson paid Two Morn- ing Visits	213

THE

OF

TO

THE INMATES OF THAT QUIET HOME

WHERE I STUDIED, FROM THE LIFE,

ONE FORECAST IN THREE PAGES,

I DEDICATE THEM

IN LIVING MEMORY OF MANY HAPPY DAYS.

CONTENTS

OF VOLUME I.

	Page
CHAPTER I. Strangers in the Land	9
— II. An Addition to the Family	15
— III. Making Acquaintance	27
— IV. Domestic Discussion	39
— V. Avant, Pendant, et Après	50
— VI. Anxieties	63
— VII. A Proposal	80
— VIII. A Crisis	94
— IX. Changed Fortunes	102
— X. The New Home	113
— XI. The Lodger on the First Floor	123
— XII. Dropped on the Stairs	131
— XIII. The Lodger on the Third Floor	141
— XIV. From Jamaica to London and Back	148
— XV. Two Aunts	152
— XVI. The Lost Clock	162
— XVII. Mr. Thompson	173
— XVIII. In which Two People speak ill of each Other	187
— XIX. Skirmishing	199
— XX. How the News was received in Jamaica	209
— XXI. The Reason why Mr. Thompson paid Two Morn- ing Visits	215

	Page
CHAPTER XXII. Deepening Shadows	225
— XXIII. In the Dead of Night	241
— XXIV. Confession	252
— XXV. A Woman's Inner Life	261
— XXVI. The Beginning of the End	268
— XXVII. Mrs. Elliston departs	280
— XXVIII. Night	289
— XXIX. In which a Question is asked and answered	297
— XXX. Life in Ormsby Crescent	309
— XXXI. Miss Pringle receives a Visit	319

THE MARSTONS.

CHAPTER I.

Strangers in the Land.

Not many miles from London stands a house on the edge of the great river. I will not point to the district more directly: let us call it Fordingham. The express train passing there brings business men to and from London in less than half an hour.

Four years since the house I write of was a moderate-sized villa, whose lilac-bushes and acacias fringed the river's bank for more than five hundred yards. From the water the house showed itself, like a coquettish beauty, by glimpses, behind the half-raised veil of two stately cedars. Between them and the house ran a gravel terrace upon which the windows of the living-rooms opened. There was no pretension to architectural beauty — there had been originally no taste of any kind shown about the building; but the dwellers in it, at this time, had contrived to give it a pleasant aspect. A little balcony had been thrust out from the central window of the bedroom floor, which was always filled with flowers. Over the face of the two white walls creepers had been trained, from window to window; and in summer time a striped awning stretched its wide-armed shade over the flight of steps leading from the drawing-room to the garden. Here, of August evenings, a venerable old man and a girl might often be seen seated enjoying the river breeze, while on the lower step a young man lay at full length upon a rug smoking his pipe. The place in those days had essentially the air of a comfortable, happy home. I am told the house has spread forth two stately wings now, and has raised its crest a whole story higher, and taken unto itself a colonnaded front, while all untidy creepers have been swept away. In the eyes of the neighbourhood, the Cedars is "much improved." I doubt whether I should like it as well.

It is but ten minutes' walk from the railway station. Other villas surround it, mostly occupied by men whom business of some kind obliged to live within easy reach of London. It is a "Cockney" neighbourhood. At the time of which I write, only one of the afore-named houses was distinguished by higher pretensions from the rest, in the title of "Park." Caverton Park was then an enclosure of some eighty acres, adjoining the Cedars. Nearly in the centre of this enclosure stood a large, frightful mansion, with conservatories, orchard-houses, and gardens of great extent, but little beauty. Here dwelt Mr. Pomfret, the richest and greatest man in those parts. But of him and his family we shall speak more anon.

The Cedars had been occupied for nearly a year. The gentleman who had taken it knew no one; nor was anything known of him at the time he arrived; and as it is proverbial that a more rigid solitude can be procured in a populous neighbourhood near London than in the most remote village in the kingdom, it is probable that the new-comer might have remained unvisited for ever but for two apparently unimportant facts.

Mr. Marston was a widower — old and blind, as it transpired — and he had but two children, a son and a daughter. It was “a great thing,” as Mrs. Pomfret remarked, that there was no mother. The son was in Claxton’s house (with him, some of the City men and a railway acquaintance); and as the father was clearly a man of substance, it was natural to suppose that the son’s prospects were good. He had a strong characteristic face, which some women thought handsome: he was under thirty; and he had the manners of a gentleman. What more could any mother of moderate expectations desire? Therefore, chiefly because there was no Mrs. Marston to push and fight for the interests of her daughter, and because the old man had a well-looking son of eight-and-twenty, the neighbourhood of Fordingham, headed by Mrs. Pomfret, was graciously disposed to extend the hand of friendship to the trio.

But — such is human nature — when it came to be seen that this hand was not seized with the alacrity which was looked for, then the spasm of cordiality increased twofold: there was no measure to the anxiety Fordingham evinced in pressing its hospitality on the new-comers. It might be that Mrs. Marston had not yet been dead two years; it might be that a foreign education indisposed the young lady, at first, for English society (since it came to be known that the family had been long resident abroad). From whatever cause, it was clear that the Marstons were careless of the social advantages Fordingham offered them. One or two sallow-faced men, with dark beards and doubtful linen, occasionally visited the Cedars on Sunday afternoons; and a lively old lady, in a yellow bonnet, had been seen on two occasions at the window of a fly that was driving in. No one else was ever known to go there.

As to Rupert Marston, like most men who are hard at work all day, he was more inclined, on his return home, to fall asleep over a book by the fire, than to dress himself up to be agreeable to a set of people he didn't know. As yet he had but the most distant, church-door acquaintance with the ladies of Fordingham, and that diurnal railway intercourse with some of its men, of which I have spoken. But there was to be a change to this state of things.

"Mamma," said Kate Pomfret to her mother, one day, "I have a piece of news. You know the old lady whom we have seen in a yellow bonnet, driving into the Cedars? Well, what do you think? I have found out that she is a Miss Pringle, Miss Marston's aunt, and that she is actually come now to live at the Cedars. She arrived yesterday. Fanny Bligh says that Mr. Cassidy called on her mother this morning, in his round of the parish, and that he had just come from the Marstons, where he was introduced to this old Miss Pringle; and he said that she was remarkably talkative, and asked a great many questions about the neighbourhood."

"Well," said Mrs. Pomfret, with a slight movement of the head, "perhaps they won't shut themselves up any longer in that ridiculous manner now. I must say I think that young man gives himself great airs — not choosing to dine out. Miss Marston, last Sunday, I saw, had left off her mourning. She is certainly a distinguished-looking girl — holds herself so well. I wish you'd had a few more lessons of Madame Michau, when we were at Brighton, Kate; you don't do yourself justice."

"I do so hope Miss Marston will come out now," said Kate, evading the question. "I think she looks so nice, if she would only let us know her."

"Yes, my dear," returned her mother, sighing, "and there are so few here with whom I like you to associate. I wish it, too, particularly on Lionel's account. I am sure, if he had more congenial spirits, he would not be so averse to society as he is. It distresses me very much, for I see it growing on him. He would hardly speak at all, you remember, the last dinner-party we had."

"He gets on very well with men, mamma; and I think," added the young lady, hesitating, "that he doesn't seem shy with those Miss Ropers."

"Don't mention the name of those vulgar girls," said Mrs. Pomfret, quickly. "I am grieved that he should have picked up an acquaintance with them. I can't think, with his refined mind, what he can see about them; — but the fact is, he is so shy that any bold, forward girl has more chance than a really lady-like, retiring one, with him. Anxious as I am to see him married, I think it would kill me if he were to fall a prey to one of those horrid creatures."

"But, mamma, I don't see why you should be so anxious about Lionel's marrying. He is not so very old. Why, Julian Westbrook is three years older — four-and-thirty, isn't he? — and he is still considered very captivating by every one (but his first cousins), I believe. Of course, we don't find him so."

"If I hadn't always brought you up to look upon Julian as your brother, I shouldn't allow him to be here now, as much as he is, Kate. But he is not a marrying man; besides, he has been too much spoilt ever to fall very seriously in love; and as he will never have anything more than he has now, it doesn't signify, as it does with Lionel. With him it is a duty."

"That is a severe penalty on being an eldest son, mamma — to be dragged to the altar against his will!"

"Not at all. It only settles his position definitely for him, instead of his shilly-shallying half his life. It would be a great weight off your father's mind, and mine, if he were comfortably and respectably married. Something must be done about him this year."

"What can you do, mamma?" said Kate, opening her eyes, and then laughing. "If you drive him to desperation he will be proposing to Miss Roper. Wouldn't Henry do as well, mamma? He will be home on leave next year. It strikes me, by-the-by, that Miss Marston is just the sort of girl he would admire. He likes slight, tall women, you know."

"I hope Henry will not be so foolish as ever to think of admiring any woman who has not a good fortune," said Mrs. Pomfret, in her quick, decisive way. "Second sons can't afford to marry just whenever the fancy seizes them."

"Nor elder sons either, it seems, for the matter of that," murmured her daughter, half aside.

"However, there's plenty of time for him to think of marrying; and I wish I was as sure of Lionel as I am of poor dear Henry, who runs a risk, really, of being spoilt with all the fuss that is made about his good looks. Lionel's, unluckily, are not a style that the world in general appreciates so much. Your father was saying to me to-day that if Lionel would only find some nice person —”

“You mean if some nice person would find him, mamma.”

“He would double his allowance, and give him a house in town. But you see, just because he has everything that a young man can possibly want to settle comfortably, he seems to set his face resolutely against it. It is too provoking.”

“Mamma,” said Kate, presently, looking up, with a smile, “I think you’d better call at the Cedars this afternoon. It would be civil to leave your card upon Miss Pringle.”

Mrs. Pomfret rang the bell, and ordered the carriage.

CHAPTER II.

An Addition to the Family.

MR. MARSTON was an old man of seventy-three, who had never been conspicuous for any great intellectual gifts. And yet his character was a rare one. Faithful, upright, simple; inwardly tender, yet having a horror of all outward emotion; manly in his devotion through life’s best years to one object; manly in his resignation, when towards life’s close that object was taken from him, — the foundations of the character were hewn out of solid and enduring material. Above this, again, Nature and the habits of threescore years and ten had erected a structure which was certainly original. The clockwork precision wherewith it pleased him that the events of yesterday should be repeated to-day, must have been violated in any household less quiet, and less devoted to the master's perfect contentment, than that of the Cedars. The humour, which, it was said, his friends had delighted in when he was a young man still smouldered, and sent up sparks now and then, indicating where the fire had been. His ill-disguised delight in the narration of every terrible catastrophe, and every deed of daring, was another amusing trait which had survived youth and middle age. When reading the Times to him daily, his daughter often drew upon her imagination for a fuller supply of calamities than that journal afforded. The state of the foreign funds was, indeed, the only other subject of the daily press in which he took a sustained interest. Politics he had long ago done with. But this — the state of Spanish Bonds, Dutch Consols, and the like — it had become the habit of half a lifetime to study. Not that he really cared about money or money-getting — it was just a habit, connected in his mind with the idea of a sound, shrewd, practical sense. That was what he prided himself upon being — a shrewd, practical man. Yet, in point of fact, wherever generosity or warmth of heart came into contact with his boasted prudence, the latter virtue went to the wall. A kinder heart in secret, a warmer friend in time of need, it would be hard to find. But there were no fine sentiments: of such he had a righteous horror. He was a little hot-tempered — a little difficult to manage sometimes; but his patience, under his great affliction, never flagged. In connexion with it the most singular fact about him remains untold. He never acknowledged that he was blind: apparently he did not know it. Whether he unwittingly deceived himself, or sought, by a loving fraud, to deceive those dearest to him, none could ever tell. The growth of this calamity had been so slow — its nature, as his family knew, was so hopeless — that the daughter's chief care, after her mother's death, was to break the force of the blow which she dreaded so much, when her father should learn that he was becoming gradually but incurably blind. When he first came to England, after his wife's death, Mr. Marston had still a glimmering of light. Six months later, even that little light was darkened. But he had begun by inveighing strongly against the fogs of our country, which on the brightest summer's day enveloped everything around him; and he still kept up the habit. He would complain fifty times a day that it was "very dark," and wonder whether they had link-boys in London streets in such perilous weather. No one could be cruel enough to destroy the innocent delusion, if such it really was. The lamp did give a very bad light; the coals were very indifferent; all the household, to judge by their own accounts, lived in a constant fog, and groped their way by faith, like the master, from room to room. He had got to know the house well — that part in which he lived, at least — and the long terrace, which he trod, with the help of his servant's arm, for one hour every day.

Out of several children born to Mr. Marston, the two youngest alone survived. Rupert came into the world when his father was already middle-aged; and by reason of his mother's health, which obliged them to live abroad, the boy never saw England until he was sent over to Harrow. Mr. Marston did not greatly prize classical learning: he could not see that it had much to do with the practical side of life; but he had himself been at a public school, and he was a great man for precedent; therefore his son went to Harrow. When it came to be a question of Rupert's going to college, however, Mr. Marston pooh-poohed the idea. For a man who was not to enter one of the learned professions, what was the use of it? Rupert was to be a merchant, which was a sensible, lucrative calling; towards which, from certain circumstances, Mr. Marston's sympathies had been drawn for several years past. His uncle, who had left him all his property, had been a merchant in Lisbon. The successor to this uncle, in the house, was one Lozados, who was a personal friend of Mr. Marston's, and with whom, at Cintra, he had resided, in habits of intimacy for many years. The house of Lozados was well known and respected, uniting, as it did, a great banking firm with one of the largest mercantile connexions in Portugal. Mr. Marston himself had never had anything to do with the business. When he was a young man his uncle had died, leaving him, unconditionally, a large sum of money. It had been optional with him to withdraw this fortune from the hands of his uncle's successor, but he had not chosen to do so. He had watched how the prosperity of the house (not without fluctuations, as revolutions and such like agitated the money-market) steadily increased; and he had resolved that his son should embrace a career which, with prudence and foresight, offered so many practical advantages. He was not to be brought up like a wealthy man's only son: no, he was to live thriftily awhile, and early acquire business habits. There were still living men who declared that in this Mr. Marston departed altogether from the precedent of his own youth. They asserted that he had once been a dashing young spark, renowned for his feats across country, and for his driving of a certain yellow Stanhope in the ring; but all this had been before his marriage, and in talking to his son he ignored those days. It would have been natural, under the circumstances, that Rupert, if he was "to acquire business habits," should enter Lozados' house; but Mr. Marston, who had been obliged to live abroad so many years on account of his wife's health, remained a thorough Englishman at heart, and he had a great dread of his son's becoming a foreigner. He preferred, therefore, the young man's entering, upon less advantageous terms, a merchant's house in London, to the more brilliant opening he could have had in Lisbon. And certain undesirable love-passages with a fair lady there, when the boy was only nineteen, confirmed the father's decision, and hastened its being carried into execution.

The various phases of the young man's life had left their traces on his character. A boyhood at Harrow, with a wandering home in Spain or Italy, where he went for a few weeks from time to time; an opening manhood over a desk in the City, with an occasional holiday in the intoxicating society of some foreign capital, this had been Rupert Marston's life. He was by nature passionate and easily stirred, but he possessed a strong will; and his feelings were generally under the control incumbent on his father's son, and an Englishman bred at a public school.

He was not expansive; and, except towards women, he rarely showed what he felt. With them, even the very plainest, his manner had in it something chival-rous and protecting, which attracted old women and young girls alike; and he had got into more than one scrape in consequence. Women, in a word, were at once his strongest and his weakest point; and because he mistrusted himself, he had rarely sought their society of late, keeping resolutely in his narrow path of daily work with unslackening energy.

That was the secret of his character. Whatever he did, he did it with all his soul and all his strength. He had been eight years now in Mr. Claxton's house, and he was an excellent man of business, with immense powers of application, and a zeal which never slackened. In the course of a few years more, if his father chose to disburse a certain sum, there was very little doubt but that Mr. Claxton would admit Rupert as a junior partner into the house. And the knowledge that that gentleman had a high opinion of his son, and that he placed an amount of confidence in him rarely accorded to so young a man, were sources of just pride to Mr. Marston. The relations between Rupert and his father were not common. The latter still exercised his parental authority undiminished, although the former was, in consequence of his father's blindness, almost absolute master to do as he pleased. Still, with forbearance and tact, he strove as patiently to bring the old man round to his way of thinking, and showed as much solicitude in obtaining his sanction and approval as though his father were still in the vigour and prime of life. In many respects Rupert was like his father; in his strong, well cut, aquiline nose, and deep-set eyes, no less than in his manly, robust temper, and in the serviceable, rather than showy, qualities of his mind. He was a man whom other men would find it difficult to "do;" but whom a woman — if haply he should fall foul of one so minded — might twist round her finger at pleasure.

Mr. Marston's daughter was seven years younger than her brother. In half an hour's walk through London streets you will see handsomer faces than hers, but you will not often find one you remember so distinctly many days after; one which sets you thinking, as this face did, about the character and story and future of its owner.

Her story hitherto was to be told in few words; her character can, at best, be only indicated here: it will be shown, as far as I have the power, in its strength and its weakness, hereafter.

She had been bred on the Continent; not bred after foreign ways, however, but by a fond and careful mother, who was as English as she could be, in all the best sense of that word. Mrs. Marston had not thought of making her daughter brilliantly accomplished; and, indeed, except to read aloud well, there was no one thing which Olivia did better than other girls. She was a tolerable musician; and she spoke more or less correctly the languages of those countries in which she had travelled — that was all. If by "a good education," therefore, is meant the labour taken to acquire a great variety of knowledge, Olivia was certainly not highly educated. But in that teaching which fits men and women to bear their burdens in life — in those noble lessons which prepare the character to resist alike the enervating effects of prosperity and the shocks of adversity — Mrs. Marston had spared no pains with her young daughter. She died when Olivia was nineteen. It was the girl's first grief; and the brave help she brought to her blind stricken father, in this his sore need, was the first fruits of the mother's teaching.

But she was by no means a faultless young person; and the mother's training had only partially succeeded in counteracting the foibles of nature. The result was one that is not uncommon, when nature and education struggle for the mastery. She was what is called "very inconsistent." People who only knew her a little, could not understand how any one so impulsive at times, should, at others, seem cold and guarded; how haply, when they looked that she should be angered, she was patient; and then again, why, suddenly, at mention of some disloyalty or wrong, the fire kindled in her cheek and eye, and she spoke words which, perhaps, had been better left unsaid. She was rapid in her decisions, which being founded on strong instincts of right and wrong, often lacked worldly wisdom; indeed, of this latter possession, she was (partly from circumstances, no doubt) singularly deficient. What will people say? was a question which it never occurred to her to ask; not because she despised conventionalities, but simply because her dealings with "the world" were so very limited that the thing never troubled her. She was always a little shy, a little cold, with strangers; she was not used to them; but there was not a particle of vanity or self-concern about her, and she very soon thawed. She had seen a great deal of life, and very little of society — which is a nice distinction. She had read a great deal, in a desultory way, and knew a great deal more than most girls of her age about all the complicated questions, the dangers, and difficulties of life. Love, save in the shadowy form wherein he presents himself to every woman, had as yet no place in her imagination. Of that great ruling mystery in life she was, practically, more ignorant than many of her juniors. She lived very much in a world of her own, and felt small desire to interrupt the habits of seclusion which her mother's death and her father's blindness had brought about. What attraction could Fordingham neighbours have for her? She discouraged their advances, however, chiefly from the fear of anything that would derange her father's fixed routine of habits. She was his mainstay. All that was to be done she did. Her chief thought was how to spare him any addition to the heavy care under which his life was shadowed.

Except when she was gardening, or driving, or about some household duty, she was by his side. Rupert was off to the City early every morning; it was she who read the Times to her father; who wrote his journal (such a journal as it was! but he would have thought that heaven and earth were going to pass away had it remained unwritten); who brought him his cheques to sign; and who was constantly at hand to answer questions as to the weather. Their talk was of out-of-the-world things, and not such gossip as the Fordingham folk enjoyed. Of perilous escapes and marvellous surprises; anecdotes of the past, of queer characters whom he had met in his youth; — such were the staple subjects between the old man and his daughter.

Of evenings, when Rupert came home, she always read aloud some stirring tale of adventure, or the explorations of the last African traveller. In such books Mr. Marston took the keenest interest, and was disappointed if anything occurred to interfere with the evening's reading. The only interruption which at all compensated to him for the loss, was the occasional visit of two old Spanish friends of his — City men — who often came down to dine at the Cedars, having a general invitation to do so. They were almost the only visitors Mr. Marston ever saw; he never talked or thought about the people who lived at a stone's-throw from his gate. Though very far from what is generally understood as an imaginative man he, too, dwelt in a world of his own — a world of the past; and such being the case, it was no wonder that the seclusion in which his daughter lived never struck him as uncommon, or undesirable.

This mode of life would have continued unchanged but for the arrival of a new inmate at the Cedars.

With that arrival, a more mundane element entered the house. Mr. Marston had no longer the uninterrupted benefit of his daughter's society. His enjoyment of those long quiet evenings was broken into. And though the reading was resumed from time to time, it was never the same thing again. For there was one listener too much, who never thoroughly liked it.

Miss Clorinda Pringle was Mrs. Marston's elder sister. For the last five-and-thirty years she had lived alone, and she was now sixty-nine. Mrs. Marston had always been fond of her sister; the strong tide of girlhood never having loosened under absence and the widening dissimilarity of their characters. As often as circumstances had permitted during the lifetime of the former they had met; but this, owing to the married lady's state of health, and the unmarried lady's dread of crossing the water, was not often. It cannot be said that Mr. Marston felt any very lively regret at this. He and his sister-in-law did not suit; and during his dear wife's lifetime he was just as well pleased that the ocean should divide them. Now the case was different. All that was connected, however remotely, with his departed wife, had a value in his eyes. Her he never named, even to his children, but they felt the secret cause of many a change in his thoughts and opinions. So when Miss Pringle drove down to the Cedars for the first time after the Marstons' arrival from abroad, Olivia was not surprised to see how cordially her father greeted her aunt Clorinda. It was so long since they had met that Olivia scarcely remembered her aunt. She found a little lively old lady, very much dressed, with a flaxen wig, and great juvenility of manner; talking very fast, and chiefly about herself; addicted to society, a great fidget, somewhat of a screw; but in the ordinary intercourse of life, good-natured, and not given to evil speaking. Of course she was selfish; it would be fatal to all of us, having no creature on earth to think of but ourselves for five-and-thirty years. She was well off, but had no home; none of the small cares and burdens to be borne for others, which a home brings with it. Her own dress, her whist, the misdemeanours of a maid, who came into office generally, with a new wig, once a year, (that being the utmost period any woman had ever been known to stand Miss Pringle's "ways"); — these, with the performance of her duties to society, filled up the measure of her thoughts and time. She dwelt in lodgings — at Bath, at Brighton, at Harrogate, and occasionally, as now, in London. She was delighted to see her relations again: thought Olivia

"very like her poor mother," was overflowing in her recollections of the past, and appeared entirely to have forgotten that her brother-in-law had not always been quite as affectionate as he now seemed.

But Olivia knew her father so well that she saw, after the second long day Aunt Clo had spent at the Cedars, that the spinster's exuberance of talk was a sore trial to Mr. Marston. He was getting a little deaf—just enough to make it necessary for those who addressed him to speak distinctly; and Aunt Clo seemed never able to get rid of her words fast enough. Yet Mr. Marston's patience held out. Apparently he was resolved to compensate to Miss Pringle for all his sins of omission in past years. At last, one day, when she was gone, after having bemoaned her forlorn condition, and her solitude at such times as she was not in society, and the discomforts of a lodging, Mr. Marston turned to his daughter and said,

"I have been calculating. Your aunt is seventy next birthday, Olivia."

"Is she, father? She doesn't look as much."

"And it is very lonely and uncomfortable for her, living all by herself. She seems fond of you, I think—eh?"

"Well—yes—I dare say she is. It was very kind of her to give me those topazes yesterday."

"Your aunt wants to come and live with us, Olive. I'm sure of it."

His daughter said nothing.

"I think we ought to ask her."

Still she was dumbfounded.

"Shall you mind it very much, Olive?"

"I, father? — it is you. I mean — of course I cannot mind anything you like; — but ——"

"I don't like it, Olivia. I don't pretend to like it. Your aunt gabbles like a magpie. I can't hear one word in a dozen she says. But she is lonely and old — and I think some one — some one who is gone — you know who, my dear — would like to offer her a home if she were alive. That is why I do it."

Then Olivia said no more. She knew that, however distasteful to her father, the thing was to be; unless her aunt should decline the offer. She did not decline it. She came, bringing a maid, and paying her due share of the household expenses. It was very characteristic of Mr. Marston, that after the great sacrifice he had made, he should charge his daughter to see that her aunt settled her accounts punctually every week.

The coming of Aunt Clo infused altogether a new element into that quiet household.

CHAPTER III.

Making Acquaintance.

"MY dear Olivia, I cannot hear of your moping yourself to death in this absurd way, seeing no one. I have no idea of moping myself, I assure you. It is very bad for my nerves. Dr. Flaherty told me when I was at Harrowgate that social relaxation was half the battle, and we sat down such a delightful party every day to dinner at the 'Granby,' it quite assisted digestion, I'm sure. I always get ill when I'm alone."

"Well, you see, Aunt Clo, you run no risk of that here, as papa and I never go out."

"That's just it! It is perfectly absurd, a girl, at your age, shutting yourself up like this; why I — I — I'm not very young, perhaps, but I should consider it quite wrong — yes, wrong — to shut myself up as if I were in a convent or monastery, or something. As to your papa, of course that is another thing. He would go about if he could, poor man, but he can't."

"Well, aunt, I can only say I don't feel as if it would amuse me a bit to go into Fordingham society. I shouldn't know what to talk about to the people. I don't think we should have many subjects in common; and, on the whole, I'm sure I'm happier at home here."

"Well, it is vastly ridiculous of you, and indeed I think it is quite selfish, Olivia, for I believe your father would be quite spirited up by hearing a little gossip about his neighbours, and seeing one or two occasionally."

"He was never fond of gossip at any time — now less than ever."

"Mr. Marston," said Miss Pringle, veering suddenly round in her chair, so as to face the old gentleman, "shouldn't you like a friend or two sometimes to drop in here? I'm sure you would."

"To drop what?" said Mr. Marston, with his hand up to his ear.

"Dear me! your papa's hearing gets worse and worse, Olivia. To drop in here — to drop you a call," she shouted.

"I'm not deaf, my dear Miss Pringle. I like people to speak distinctly — but you need never scream at me. No, I can't say that I should like that sort of thing dropped on me at all hours. Olivia keeps these rooms so dark that it is impossible to see who comes in. And then the fog; it's as much as one can do to find the way to one's mouth. Does the fog get in your head, Miss Pringle, as it does into mine?"

"Bless your heart! Mr. Marston, there's no fog. It is a bright April day."

"Hush!" whispered Olivia, flushing. "You forget, Aunt Clo, we never contradict him about the fog." Then she said aloud, "It is a beautiful day, father, but we are too near London not to feel the influence of the smoke. Besides, coming from a clear sunny climate, as we do, of course it seems worse to us."

"Well, at least you will allow that it is quite warm, Mr. Marston," cried Aunt Clo.

"I should say it was both dark and cold," returned the blind man, "but I am glad if others don't find it so. Olivia," he continued, extending his hand over the fire, "these coals don't throw out any heat; you should get some more."

"I will put on a log of wood; that will make a blaze."

"Gracious! I must go to the window," exclaimed Aunt Clo. "The skin is nearly burnt off my face as it is. Do you use milk of roses, Olivia? You ought to. It's the way I've kept my complexion as I have. And you shouldn't sit over that great roasting fire."

"My father likes my sitting here, and I don't feel it."

"Olivia," he said, turning round to her side, "when will Rupert be back? It is quite dark already — eh?"

"He will not be back for a long time yet, it gets dark so soon."

"Dark!" cried Aunt Clo (but she was too far for Mr. Marston to hear her), "why, we are going out to drive. How can you talk so? It is time to go and put on our things; the carriage will be round in ten minutes."

And Aunt Clo frisked out of the room.

"Father, we are going out for a short drive."

"Dear me! what can be the pleasure of driving in such weather? The coachman will be sure to lose his way, or drive you up against something, and smash the panels in. Why can't you stay at home? Home is much the best place in these fogs."

"So it is; but we foolish women like going out, no matter what the weather is. And John, you know, is so steady, there is never any danger with him. My aunt is anxious to return some visits that have been paid her, and she would be unhappy not to go."

"What a woman that is," muttered the old man, "never quiet for a single half-hour. There is nothing to be done, is there, Olivia?"

"Nothing at all, but to sit still by your fireside, and pity our restlessness in wanting to go out in such weather."

"I did take my walk, you know," he said, quickly. "And then you wrote my journal, and we did the accounts together. Did you send that pound to the soldier's wife you read to me about in the Times?"

"Yes, father, I sent it without your name."

"That was right. And you wrote my letter to Lozados? Well, then there's nothing more to be done. No cheque to sign, I hope?"

"Oh dear no," returned Olivia, smiling. "No cheques, nothing at all to do but to sit still. Shall Fritz come and be with you?"

Mr. Marston would never admit that he wanted any one. Hence his reply to Miss Pringle's suggestion of friends "dropping in." Hence, too, his invariable rejoinder when Olivia proposed his German servant coming to sit with him.

"Well, he can come if he likes; but remember, I don't want him, Olivia, and I'm not going out again."

But as his daughter knew, notwithstanding this protest, that her father found the old Alsatian soldier, with his recollections of Napoleon and his stories of the retreat from Moscow, very pleasant company, Fritz was sent up-stairs.

"M'sieu feut se promener encore un betit beu?" asked Fritz, as usual, on entering the room.

"Ah! Qu'est-ce que vous me proposez là?" was the reply in good slow strong English-French, delivered with indignation, as though the proposal were quite unheard of, "Par ung pareil temps, Fritz . . . Ah!"

"Si m'sieu feut b'en essayer, il fait un temps doux, comme . . . de la pâte d'amande!" returned Fritz, as he bent over his master.

"Il ne faut pas congredire la raison, Fritz. N'est-ce pas que le brouillard vous monte dans la tête?"

"Parbleu, oui, m'sieu, mais — ça n'empêche pas — le zoleil va son train, tout de même."

And, after a great deal more persuasion, Fritz got his master out upon the terrace. There was always a grand battle to obtain this second walk.

Olivia, as in duty bound, accompanied her aunt in the round of visits the spinster was delighted to have to return within a fortnight after her arrival; but on this afternoon Mrs. Pomfret was the only lady they found at home.

They were shown into a large and very sumptuous drawing-room, where a stout comely woman of fifty sat at work, talking to a young man who had all the appearance of being at home, as he lounged back on the sofa, with his feet upon a chair. A short, smooth, fresh-faced girl stood near the fireplace. She had apparently just come in from riding. Her hat was in her hand, and the end of her dark hair, slipping from its comb, had partially fallen.

"I'm delighted to be at home when you called," said Mrs. Pomfret, rising. "It is such a chance ever finding any one. Kate, my love, you know Miss Marston — my daughter, Miss Pringle — and Miss Marston, allow me to introduce my nephew, Mr. Westbrook. Is your brother at home, Kate?"

Kate was understood to say "No," while Miss Pringle looked round her, and kept exclaiming, "Dear me, what a beautiful house! Really quite a palace, Mrs. Pomfret; quite fitted for a fête, I'm sure!"

The lady smiled, and sank her voice into a confidential tone.

"We do occasionally gather our neighbours together, Miss Pringle; but to tell you the truth there are very few with whom we can be intimate here, and those we see more of a quiet way at dinner."

"With a rubber of whist, I dare say, afterwards?" suggested Miss Pringle.

"Exactly; or a little music, as the case may be. Sometimes the young people get up a waltz, when we get down a few gentlemen from London. Our society," she added, shaking her head, "is very limited. One is obliged to be particular, you know. Such people as we have coming here, and taking good houses!"

"Indeed?" said her visitor, with elevated brows. "Dear me! now, when I looked round in church and saw such a number of — of smart bonnets, and so on, I thought you must have quite a large society here."

"Mostly retired trades," said Mrs. Pomfret, mournfully. "Some of them not even retired."

Now Mrs. Pomfret's father was a soap-boiler. I have refrained from mentioning the painful fact hitherto; but the truth, sooner or later, must be told. Mr. Pomfret, who was a gentleman (though an uncommonly dull one) in every sense of the word, and a sleeping partner in a bank, had married Mrs. Pomfret, no doubt in consideration of her very large fortune. She had made him a good wife, and, according to her lights, she was an excellent mother. She had, besides, infinitely more brains than her husband. Her failings it is unnecessary to point out, for they lay upon the surface, and sometimes obtruded themselves, indeed, more annoyingly than serious vices might have done; so that, in this manner, much that was kind and excellent was obscured.

"I dare say Mr. Marston feels, as I do, that with daughters, one can't be too particular, Miss Pringle. It is a great responsibility. With only a brother, too, to chaperone her. I can quite understand Mr. Marston's not caring that his daughter should make many acquaintance at first; but now that you are come, Miss Pringle, and can act as mamma, I do hope we shall see more of your niece."

"I'm sure you're very kind. I was telling her, only to-day, that I meant to break through her conventual habits. Quite ridiculous, a girl of her age, moping herself in that way, isn't it? And to do Mr. Marston justice, though he says he doesn't like society himself, I'm sure he would never stand in the way of Olivia's going out."

"Charming person she seems to be — so refined-looking, so unlike the common herd, Miss Pringle."

That lady evidently accepted this as a subtle compliment to herself.

"She takes after the Pringles, I believe; and there is a strong likeness runs throughout the family to the portraits of our great ancestor who was henchman to Robert the Bruce."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Mrs. Pomfret, with great unction. "How very interesting! What a very old family! Well, Miss Marston, I must say, has a great air of nobility."

"We are all said to have that je ne sais quoi which is seen in the portraits of the great henchman; but I believe my colouring, the colour of my hair, at least, is more like his than Olivia's; but then she, you see, has a touch of the Marstons."

By what process of reasoning the spinster contrived to believe that she was unadulterated Pringle (unless she could show that that race had bred in and in throughout all these generations), while in her niece the pure type was marred, it would have been curious to learn. Mrs. Pomfret was quite sharp enough to perceive this little difficulty, but her mind was held in thrall by the fact of her visitor's great antiquity — of family, and she forbore from any indiscreet question. The conversation between the two elder ladies gained strength and volume as it flowed along. It meandered through a variety of fields, but it never slackened; that little disclosure of the henchman had given it a marvellous impetus.

The "young people" were, in the meantime, improving acquaintance at the other end of the room. The gentleman who had been introduced under the name of Westbrook had sauntered towards the young ladies; but, as though he felt himself too tall, or was too indolent, to remain standing at his full height — and he was nearly six feet three — he leaned, with his arms folded, against the embrasure of the window, and in this attitude occasionally dropped a word or two into the girls' conversation. He was well-looking, and better made than most very tall men are: broad in the chest and straight in the legs, with good hands and feet. The upper part of the face was very handsome, but the mouth, distinctly seen under the slight fair moustache, was not a pleasant mouth in repose, though when he spoke the fine even teeth and a pleasant voice obliterated its disagreeable effect. The manner was that of a man careless and lazy until roused — accustomed, probably, to conquest — and so completely self-assured as to render effort, restraint, or hesitation, entirely impossible with him. In a vulgar man this would have been insupportable, but Julian Westbrook was a gentleman. There was that about him which might attract or repel you, but his manner could never be thought offensive. Miss Marston having conceived of most Englishmen that they were shy, stiff, and ill at ease, was agreeably surprised with this specimen. It chanced that, after a while, Miss Pomfret asked her if she rode. Olivia replied that she had done so a good deal in Spain, whereupon Westbrook observed that he had ridden through the greater part of Spain the year before. They fell to talking of different places known to them both, and this link once found, a chain quickly formed itself. Westbrook was roused. He had been to Cintra. He knew the house where the Marstons had lived for five winters. He even knew a merchant there who was one of their oldest friends. The interchange of reminiscence was so animated that Kate Pomfret found herself completely stranded and forgotten. When Miss Pringle rose to take leave her niece was quite surprised to find that more than twenty minutes had slipped away. Westbrook conducted them to the carriage.

"What a very fine man, Olivia," exclaims Aunt Clo, as the carriage drives off. "How I do like tall men! I wish Rupert were a little taller, Olivia."

"Rupert is quite tall enough; I think," said his sister, tetchy for her brother's reputation, even in the matter of inches. "He is nearly five feet ten. Those very tall men never know what to do with their legs."

"Well, this one had his legs most comfortably stretched on a chair when we came in," laughed the old lady. "I thought it quite a pity to disturb him. But I suppose he was repaid by talking to you. You seem to get on famously together."

"Yes," said Olivia. "We got on very well, for he knows dear San Salvador, and all my favourite walks at Cintra: and we found we had mutual acquaintances, too. I little thought ever to meet any one at the Pomfrets' whom I could talk to about the dear old place."

"Well, now I hope you're obliged to me for making you come out of your shell. Mrs. Pomfret seems really a charming woman, and quite sociably inclined. And what a beautiful house! I'm sure they must have very nice parties."

"Do ladies in England wear flowers in their caps of a morning? She is good-natured, I should think, but rather oppressively over civil. I thought the daughter pretty — didn't you, aunt?"

"I can't say I looked at her much. I saw a young person in a Joseph, or something of the kind, who didn't seem to me to open her lips. You and the tall good-looking man — what's his name? — had the talking all to yourselves, Olivia."

"Oh, Aunt Clo! I hope I wasn't rude," said Olivia, colouring with compunction. "I was interested in talking about Cintra, and I'm afraid I forgot her."

In Mrs. Pomfret's drawing-room, meantime, the departed visitors were, of course, equally being discussed.

"Well, Julian, what do you think of our new beauty? I am so annoyed that Lionel wasn't here. Such a good opportunity to have introduced him, and then he could have gone and called."

"Catch him, my dear aunt," said Westbrook smiling. "I can't say that I think he has had any great loss in missing the opportunity of being introduced to your beauty. He can see better-looking women any day."

"Oh, come, Julian!" laughed Kate; "that's rather good. I'm not blind, you know. You never look half as interested or animated when you're talking to Miss Wells, or Miss Bligh, as you did just now. You may say what you like, I'm sure you do admire Miss Marston."

"Do I, Kate? Well, of course, you know best. I grant the girl is thorough-bred-looking, and —"

"That she has every right to be," struck in Mrs. Pomfret. "The Pringles, it seems, are a very old family. Their ancestor was henchman to Robert Bruce."

"Oh," said Julian, dryly. "Well, the descendant of King Robert the Bruce's henchman is too sallow. There is something piquant about her face, but she don't carry enough flesh. That isn't at all the sort of thing for Lionel. He won't admire her."

"I didn't say that he would," remarked his provoking cousin, sotto voce. "What I said was that you did."

"I don't know when," said Mrs. Pomfret, ruminating, "I don't know when I have seen a young person who has taken my fancy so much. So distinguished — so very distinguished, Julian. And Miss Pringle is really a very nice lively old lady; a little vain, a little foolish, perhaps, but really very pleasant. I must ask them to dinner at once. Now, what day can you come down, Julian? — and we'll try and get up a little party; only, don't throw us over as you did last time, because your uncle doesn't like it."

"I didn't promise. When I promise I always keep my engagements."

"Hem! — well, I don't know about that. At all events, will you promise now?"

"Yes. Next Wednesday or Friday; either day is free," said he, referring to his engagement-book.

"Good. I will give them the choice; they can't well escape then. I must make sure of Lionel first, however: and remember, I count upon you."

CHAPTER IV.

Domestic Discussion.

OLIVIA was struck with her brother's manner that evening. She thought he looked anxious, and seemed preoccupied. Indeed, he took so little part in the conversation that even Aunt Clo, who talked too much to observe such things generally, had her attention roused to the fact; and, as usual, she did not hesitate a moment in communicating the result of her observation to its object.

"Why, what is come to you to-night, Rupert?" You can't open your lips. I suppose you're in love. Come, tell us the name of the fair lady. It must be that, you know; because it's quite unnatural your sitting there when you come from town, and having nothing to tell us — not a word to say — when we're expecting you to give us all the news."

Thus rallied, Rupert laughed, and exerted himself to answer his aunt in a becoming spirit.

"You're quite right, Aunt Clo; you have an extraordinary gift of always divining the truth. I'm over head and ears in love with an enchanting creature I met in an omnibus. We had a shower just as I was leaving the City. I couldn't get a cab, and I didn't choose to get wet outside a 'bus, so I did what I particularly dislike, generally — got in. I was rewarded, in this instance, by sitting opposite the most lovely creature I think I have ever seen."

Olivia looked up from her work to see if Rupert was in earnest, or only inventing for Aunt Clo's amusement. She could not tell; but in either case she, of course, felt very sure that the anxious expression of his face had no sort of connexion with his omnibus beauty.

"Well, and of course you followed her? And who did she turn out to be? I was once in an omnibus myself, and I remember a man staring at me; and I was so uncomfortable because there was a woman with two babies opposite me, and another who would suck oranges, and the juice came over my black silk cloak, and I thought it was altogether very disagreeable; and certainly no one with any sort of pretensions to — to appearance ought ever to go in one (indeed, if it hadn't been for the rain, I shouldn't, of course, have got into one then); so that I really pity your beauty, Rupert, if she was a lady."

"I tell you, Aunt Clo, she was simply divine. How can you institute a doubt, after that, as to whether she was a lady? Very modest; very quietly dressed; the loveliest little hands you ever saw, which looked as if they had been picking rose-buds all their life — no harder work than that. Then such hair and eyes! She got out in Tottenham-court-road, and I watched her get into another 'bus — a Hampstead one. That is all I know about her; but my peace of mind is irrevocably gone."

"Bless me! Why didn't you follow her, then, and find out who she was? I remember once being followed. It was at Tunbridge, and I was walking up and down the Pantiles; and every turn I took, the man turned also, until at last it became so conspicuous that I had to go home. I have reason to believe that the man learnt who I was, for he discontinued his pursuit after that (knowing, of course, that it would be hopeless); and indeed he had the good taste whenever we met generally to look the other way, which I thought showed great delicacy."

"Great," said her nephew. "But I showed greater, for I would not follow my beauty at all. In the first place, I thought it would distress her to be tracked from omnibus to omnibus in that way; in the next, I knew you would be waiting for dinner, and I had only just time to catch the train."

When both Mr. Marston and Miss Pringle were gone to bed, Olivia, as she wished her brother good night, whispered —

"You are anxious, dear Rupert, about some thing — I do not ask you what; for if it were anything in which I could be of use, I know you would tell me."

"I will tell you, Olive. Though my trouble is not one you can understand, the difficulty in which it places me you will. I have reason to believe that it would be a very good thing if I could persuade my father to remove a large portion of his property from Lozados' house in Lisbon, where it all now is. But, as you know, this is just one of the few subjects upon which it is very difficult to talk to him. From the loss of his sight, now his mind broods over anything of this kind, and agitates itself so much upon any matter of business that I feel afraid of the effect of entering into a discussion with him on such a subject. Besides which, his prejudices on certain points are strong, and I doubt any arguments of mine having effect in moving them. Still I feel it a grave responsibility to withhold from telling him what I think."

Olive stood still for a moment, the lighted candle in her hand.

"Tell him, Rupert," she said, decisively. "If you think it right, you musn't hesitate to tell him."

"But you always dread his being agitated, and you know the discussion is sure to agitate him. If I speak to him at all upon the matter, I must speak plainly."

"Mayn't it save him from greater agitation hereafter, dear? I never would say anything to worry him, unless it's absolutely right and necessary; but, then, I think — indeed, I'm sure — Rupert, one oughtn't to hesitate. Tell him to-morrow morning openly all you think, and leave me to tranquillise his mind afterwards as best I may."

Rupert Marston delayed going to town for a couple of hours on the following morning in order to have the necessary interview with his father. The old gentleman must not be disturbed out of his ordinary routine let what might happen. He breakfasted in his own room, and left it as the clock struck ten. Before that hour none but Fritz ever saw him. He would have looked upon it as ridiculous, and been annoyed had either of his children in their anxiety after his health ever penetrated this morning sanctuary. At ten, therefore, on this morning as usual, he entered the library, his journal-book in his hand, ready for Olivia to make the little entry of monotonous sameness which he would not for worlds have omitted. Rupert was here alone, waiting to receive him. Olivia had contrived, on some haberdashery pretence or other, to get Aunt Clo away to her own room.

"Good morning, father."

"You here? Why, how comes it you are not in town? Where's Olivia? Ain't she here to write my journal?"

"She is engaged with my aunt for a few minutes. She will be down presently." Then, with a great effort, "I want to speak to you, father, about keeping all your money out of England — in Lozados' or any foreign bank. The interest they pay is very large I know, but there is a great feeling prevails in this country of the insecurity of these banks. Lozados is a great friend of yours: I am aware that you will be very loth to remove your money from his keeping; but all the men of business whom I know regard it as very unsafe to keep the bulk of one's property in such hands. I think it right to tell you this, father, as I have now of course more opportunities of hearing the opinions of various classes of men in the City upon these subjects than you have. What I now mention is not only the opinion of Mr. Claxton: it is universal."

Mr. Marston was bending forwards, his lips parted, and his hand raised to his ear so as not to lose a syllable his son uttered. His cheek did not flush; neither did his eye kindle. A slightly sarcastic smile just touched the corners of his mouth. His son was amazed to see how calmly his father heard him to an end.

"There is nothing new under the sun, Rupert. I knew all you have been saying five-and-thirty years ago, when we first went to live abroad. The fortune your great uncle left me had been for years, as you know, in the hands of Lozados, who became his partner in the mercantile house, and I scarcely thought myself justified, when I inherited his money, in removing it from that house. I shouldn't think myself justified in doing so now, certainly. They have always proved punctual in their payments — honourable in all their dealings. I have never had any reason to regret continuing to bank with them, though, of course, I have been urged, over and over again, to transfer my money here and get one-third less income! No, Master Rupert, you can do as you please when I am gone, but as long as I live — it won't be very long — I don't desert my old friends. Why, Lozados and I are just the same age."

"I am sorry, father" — and the son's manner showed that his father's words hurt him — I am sorry you should think I would not respect your wishes at all times — or that I have any selfish feeling in what I say. It is to spare you future anxiety that I ask you to consider whether it is not advisable to take at least a portion of your property out of Lozados' hands. He may be the most honourable man in the world, but he may be unfortunate. There exists a feeling in the City that his house is not very secure. It is known to have sustained heavy losses lately."

"So it did in 1834, and it tided them over. Every one said, then, it was in danger; but I wouldn't take a penny out, and perhaps I and a few others were instrumental in keeping him afloat."

Rupert was silent: then he resolved to make one more effort.

"At least, father, will you let Olivia's fortune be taken out, and vested in the hands of trustees for her? If she married an Englishman to-morrow, he —"

"There is time enough to talk of that when she does marry," interrupted Mr. Marston, raising his head. "At present Olivia doesn't seem anxious to leave me, and where I think it well that my money should be, I believe she is content that hers should remain."

There was a slight reproach conveyed in the words which was not lost on Rupert. He felt there was nothing more to be said or to be done. He had expected to find his father difficult to persuade, excited, irritable; but he was not prepared to find him so ready to reply to every argument he had to adduce, so clear in his views, so impossible to alarm, so tenacious of the purpose which he had held unchanged through all these years. He saw it was hopeless; with a sigh he left the room, and taking his hat walked out of the house without seeing Olivia. When she came down a few minutes later, in some anxiety as to how her father should have borne the interview with Rupert, she found the former sitting tranquilly in his arm-chair with an amused smile upon his face.

"Is that you, Olivia? I've had Rupert here, my dear, full of wise saws which he has picked up in the City, and trying to frighten me about my old friend Lozados. The boys in the present day amuse me; they are so mighty prudent and clever. Why, as I told him, they tried to make me take all my money out of Lozados' hands long before Rupert was even born or thought of, so I'm not going to be terrified by that cry of 'wolf' now — eh, Olivia?"

"The wolf did come at last, father," said the girl, gravely. Then she came and sat at his feet, and took his hand between hers.

"What! Rupert has been trying to frighten you, too, has he?" exclaimed the acute old man. "Now, listen to me, child. For nearly fifty-five years I have managed my own affairs, and pretty well, too, I flatter myself.

I've always been a careful man — you know my favourite proverb, 'Take care of the pence and the pounds will take care of themselves.' You act upon that, and tell Rupert to act upon it, Olivia, and not to trouble his head about Lozados. He is as safe as the Bank of England. He has been my friend for five-and-thirty years, and my uncle's before me. I am not going to give him up now for any boy's whim."

He spoke for the first time with some heat, and brought down his thin hand smartly upon the arm of his chair as he finished. Olivia saw, as her brother had done, that it would be worse than useless to pursue the subject further. It was so very seldom she had ever heard her father assume this tone, since age and infirmity had rendered him so dependent upon his children, that she saw at once it would be not only unbecoming but likely to make him seriously angry, if the discussion were renewed. And however sorry she might feel for Rupert's anxiety, she could not but honour the noble trustfulness which prompted her father to refuse to withdraw his fortune out of the hands of his old friend. Yet this was the man who prided himself on his shrewd, practical sense; and held in horror all romance and sentiment.

To him, in the course of that same morning, enters Aunt Clo, bearing in her hand an open note, highly scented, and having an elaborate mauve-coloured cipher outside. Miss Pringle has manœuvred, in her turn, to get Olivia well out of the way.

After this necessary preliminary she sits deliberately down, with battering-rams and every other implement of war before the fortress, which she is resolved to carry either by a coup de main or by undermining, and all the slow artifices of a siege. She draws her chair close to her blind brother-in-law, and then she coughs in order that he may know that it is she.

"Very dark," observes Mr. Marston. "Does the fog get into your head?"

"Oh dear, no — yes, I mean — yes, very much, of course. But what I came to talk to you about now was Olivia, Mr. Marston — Olivia" (very loud).

"Don't scream. Well, what about her?"

"Why, you know, I am rather anxious about her."

"God bless my soul! why every one seems to be anxious about something or other to-day. It must be the weather. Why, the girl is well enough, Miss Pringle; what ails her?"

"Oh, nothing ails her, exactly. Her bodily health is good enough. She would be improved by being a little fatter, perhaps; but it isn't that — I was thin when I was her age. All the symmetry of my form came at a much later date, and —"

"Did it?" said Mr. Marston, gravely. By-and-by you shall tell me exactly when that was. Now, about Olivia. Stick to your subject, Miss Pringle. If it isn't her bodily health, what is it? You're not going to tell me she is in love? If so, it must be old De Castro, or Montalba, who is still older, for she sees no one else."

The blind man seemed mightily tickled at the idea, for he did then what he seldom did: he laughed.

"Ah! that's exactly it," struck in Miss Pringle, with alacrity. "You have just hit the right nail on the head, Mr. Marston. She sees no one else! Now, this isn't a natural or a right state of things at her age, and with her position and fortune, and so on; she ought to mix. Nothing is so good for a girl as mixing. Mixing,

I may say, does us all good; but young people really become brutes and bears when they don't mix — and then they've no chances! Not that I think marriage essential to happiness, of course, or I shouldn't have refused all the offers I did: it stands to reason. Only I shouldn't have known whether I really preferred remaining single if I hadn't mixed. How should I? Now, Olivia, you must be aware, knows no more of the world than a child unborn. She has actually never been to a ball! She is nearly one-and-twenty, and I don't believe she has ever been in a room with fifty people in her life! It is quite preposterous. The nearest approach to society seems to have been the very confined circle you had at Cintra — and now, here, since she has come, she has declined every invitation, and shut herself up from the very friendly, sociable people you are surrounded by. I really think, Mr. Marston, it is high time you should interfere."

"I can't force the girl to go out if she doesn't like it, Miss Pringle. I don't see that people are a bit happier for gadding about; I'm glad Olivia isn't as restless as some women are, never happy but when they are going somewhere."

"Well, for that matter, I believe Olivia would like a little society as much as any one. You must be aware, Mr. Marston, that it is entirely on your account she declines going out. And I must say, I think her poor dear mother, if she was alive, wouldn't like her being shut up as she is, for I remember that no one enjoyed a ball more than Sarah did when she was a girl, and we both of us had more partners at the county balls than any other girls, and though some said that I was lighter than Sarah, yet —"

"There — there, Miss Pringle, say no more about it. I have never prevented Olivia's going out with her brother where and when she liked; but perhaps you are right. And that I ought to urge her going — perhaps you are right. Her mother was too great an invalid ever to go out, so we insensibly fell into these habits of retirement. We get selfish without knowing it," he sighed. "Perhaps you are right. She shall go out of an evening. I'll speak to her about it."

"You mustn't ask her whether she likes it, Mr. Marston. She will be sure to say, No. You must tell her you wish it, and that it will amuse you to hear all about your neighbours."

"But it won't; and what's more, she wouldn't believe me if I told her so. However, I suppose you are right. I suppose at her age she ought to go out, and," he added as if to himself — "and Sarah would have wished it, perhaps. If it wasn't for the fog — if it wasn't so confoundedly dark in this country, I — I should go out with her myself, but — but I can't; Sarah knows I can't, so Rupert must take care of the child."

My dear Mr. Marston here am I always ready, you know, to supply the place of a mother to dear Olivia, and take her out, and give her the advantage of my knowledge of society, for I have mixed so much that I know at once what acquaintance it is desirable for her to make — and it is not every one who has the requisite savoir faire. Dear Rupert of course knows nothing of such matters. Now, there are the Pomfrets of Caverton Park, evidently quite a superior class of people, — powdered footmen and so on — and most amiable in their manners. I'm sure it was impossible to say more than Mrs. Pomfret did about Olivia yesterday; and I must also add, as was evident, that she took a very great fancy to me. The proof of it is, that this very morning comes this invitation to dinner next Wednesday. There couldn't be a better opportunity for Olivia's introduction. Mrs. Pomfret herself told me their dinners were very select."

"Provided they give you enough to eat, they might leave their selection to you," observed the old gentleman, grimly. "You had better sit down and accept it, and then that will obviate all discussion on the matter. I hate discussions."

Miss Pringle was quite delighted with the success of her stroke of finesse. She rose, saying:

"I will go and do so at once. There is a note, I see, for Rupert, but that he will of course answer for himself."

CHAPTER V.

Avant, Pendant, et Après.

NOT until the answer was despatched was Olivia told of the invitation.

"I should be much happier spending the evening with you, father. I don't want to go to these people's house a bit. I scarcely know them. Let Rupert escort Aunt Clo, and let me remain at home. I can't bear your being left by yourself."

"God bless my soul! If a man of seventy-five can't be by himself for two or three hours he must be a poor creature, or have a very bad conscience, Olivia. I wish you'd get rid of that idea that I always must have some one with me. If you'd only get better coals and candles — that's all I ask. You do keep these rooms so confoundedly dark it is as much as one can do to find the way to one's mouth."

"Dear father," said his daughter, looking at him with loving eyes, and shaking her head sadly, in her consciousness that he could not see her, "you must find it very dark, I'm sure; and that is why your children, who are young and strong, don't like to leave you; not that you cannot stand solitude, father, better than any one — not that — oh, no."

She stooped down, and kissed his forehead; but he only suffered this little approach to sentiment under protest.

"There — there — that will do now. Where's the paper? You didn't finish it, did you? You read the City article, and about the fire at Leeds — awful, to be sure! A terrible calamity! — any other news?"

"Well, here is a paragraph entitled 'A Strange Visitor. The little town of — was thrown into a state of commotion on Saturday last by the appearance of a bear at large in the streets. The inhabitants, it may be imagined, fled in all directions, and it was not without considerable difficulty and peril that the unwelcome stranger was captured. This was effected at last, by some one from a first-floor window flinging a net over Bruin, and, during his efforts to disentangle himself, the chain which he had broken was made once more secure around his neck. It appears that an enterprising hairdresser had made this singular purchase the previous day from a travelling menagerie overstocked with bears, meaning to kill and extract the grease from this inhabitant of the Polar regions. As may be surmised, the inhabitants of —, taking the law into their own hands, insisted upon the hairdresser's at once fulfilling his intentions, and Bruin was despatched without further loss of time."

"Horrible! What a predicament — meeting a bear, in a cul-de-sac, we'll say, without a chance of escape! If one clambered up a water-pipe, why the bear would come after one, and of course nobody would open a door or a window to let one in. No one was killed, then?"

"No, apparently not; but here is a garotte robbery, in which the sufferer has been fearfully wounded. 'On Tuesday night last, as a gentleman named Hilman was walking down Baker-street, at eleven o'clock, he was met by —'"

"Olivia, my dear!" cries Miss Pringle, entering the room in a fume, "do come and give me your advice. I am terribly put out. That stupid creature of mine has been and mistaken the order I gave her so distinctly, and trimmed my —"

"Well?" said Mr. Marston, impatiently, "go on; what was he met by?"

"My new green satin gown —"

"What?" he inquired again, yet more impatiently.

"With black instead of white lace!" screamed Aunt Clo. "And it's cut — that is the worst of it — all round the neck, and the arms too — oh, it's abominable!"

"What the deuce is your aunt talking about? Who is it that is cut round the neck, and the arms, too? I wish people would speak distinctly. The robber couldn't have had time to maim him in that way, in the street."

Olivia laughed heartily.

"It's my aunt's dress she is talking of."

"Oh, confound her dress," he muttered to himself.

"Isn't it provoking?" continued Miss Pringle, too much absorbed in her woe to think of joking. "And I had made up my mind to wear it at the Pomfrets; and now the black is spoilt for what I wanted it."

"It will look very nice where it is — on the green," observed Olivia.

"Not at all. I look a perfect fright in green, without white to relieve it. I'll make her unpick it, every stitch. Servants are the plague of one's life, that's the truth, Olivia. They're always stupid — always making mistakes. Do come up to my room, my dear, and give me your advice."

"I will come presently, when I have done reading the paper, Aunt Clo."

Then, as Mr. Marston heard the door close behind his irritated sister-in-law, he murmured:

"Foolish woman! I say, Olivia, when you go to balls and dinners, don't let them turn your head, girl, and stuff it full of finery and nonsense. Else, may be, you had better have stayed at home."

The Wednesday came: and witnessed that event which, by the force of a strong will, Miss Pringle had brought about. Olivia Marston was present, for the first time in her life, at an English dinner-party. And, contrary to her own expectations, she was amused. Her right-hand neighbour, Mr. Lionel Pomfret (who had taken her in, by Mrs. Pomfret's dexterous arrangement), did not, indeed, address a single syllable to her during dinner; and as Olivia was not accustomed to try and make conversation to young men, she resigned herself, without any compunction, to the pleasant neighbour who sat on her other side. The heir of the house of Pomfret was small, and sickly-looking, with neat, mean features, an unwholesome colour, and a glass in his eye. His very thin hair was gummed tight to his head, and his diminutive moustaches gummed straight on end, away from his face. He wore a very elaborate shirt, with large pearl studs; and in the society of ladies, at least — as may have been inferred from his mother's and sisters' conversation — he had not a word to say. It was reported by his friends that there were certain exceptions to this rule; but if so, the exceptions did not fall in that circle of society which Mrs. Pomfret cultivated; and this was perhaps quite as well. Olivia's left-hand neighbour was Julian Westbrook. Mrs. Pomfret viewed the arrangement by which her nephew got next Miss Marston with vexation, and now that she saw Olivia's attention monopolised, it went far to spoil the pleasure of the evening for the good lady. She began to regret that she had asked Julian to come. But then he was such an addition on these occasions that it was felt to be dull when he did not come; and his aunt could never withstand the pleasure of securing her handsome, fashionable nephew, who had more invitations than he could possibly accept, and who indulged his aunt's weakness, by retailing the gossip of circles beyond her reach. He was far too knowing to try and entertain Olivia with such idle talk. He talked, as well informed men of the world do, upon a variety of topics, with equal facility. He had considerable taste for painting and music (of the modern schools — he honestly confessed that he hated all that was "classical," in either art); he had travelled a good deal; he had at least dabbled in all sorts of books; and finally, he possessed that aptness in conveying to others a vivid impression of what he had heard, seen, and read, which is essential to pleasantness. If the greater part of those ladies, however, who had sat beside Julian at dinners that season had listened to his conversation with Olivia, they would have been surprised. He was a many-sided man.

The annoyance Mrs. Pomfret naturally felt at seeing her son so completely eclipsed where she wished him to shine was counterbalanced, in some measure, by watching how very nicely Kate and Rupert Marston were getting on upon the opposite side. Before the second course was off the table the fond mother had arranged it all in her own mind, and was calculating what it was likely that Mr. Marston would allow his son. Sir James Yellowly, the East India Director, who sat beside her, found that his remarks fell upon inattentive ears; but being a good-natured man, and knowing that Lady Yellowly herself was always sadly pre-occupied during the solemn banquets which they periodically gave in Harley-street, he bore no resentment; but devoted himself chiefly to Miss Pringle, who, indeed, as we know, required no encouragement to talk with enough volubility for two.

There was another point upon which Mrs. Pomfret's mind was not quite at rest during dinner. Indeed when she turned her eyes in the direction of a rigid elderly young lady who sat at the further end of the table, on Mr. Pomfret's left hand, the thoughts of the hostess became harrowed by the cruel suspicion that she had committed a breach of etiquette. On Mr. Pomfret's right sat a plain middle-aged lady, whose husband, Captain Bagshott, was a distinguished sailor.

He it was who had handed the rigid elderly young lady to dinner; and apparently he did not find his position beside her quite agreeable. Mrs. Pomfret's arrangements had been all thrown out owing to Lady Yellowly's suddenly having the influenza. At the last moment little Mary — only sixteen — was dressed and sent down to fill the vacant seat at table.

"My dear Miss Pringle," said Mrs. Pomfret, immediately the ladies had retired, while she drew her guest at the same time to a distant corner of the room, "do tell me whether I was wrong in sending Mrs. Bagshott out first, before Miss Turkaine? Ought Miss Turkaine to have precedence, as a baronet's daughter? Captain Bagshott, you know, is C.B., and I always imagined that the wives of Companions of the Bath, you know, went out before baronet's daughters, but I may be mistaken — and I should be so distressed to have done what looks so ignorant and stupid. Miss Turkaine stands very much upon her precedence, and I observed that she didn't look at all pleased during dinner."

Miss Pringle racked her brain to recal some analogous case, and how the delicate question had then been decided. She remembered upon one occasion, at Cheltenham, seeing Mrs. Carbuncle taken out before Miss Catherine Weal, who, as everybody knew, was a baronet's daughter; but then Mrs. Carbuncle was niece, by marriage, to the late Earl of Mountgarnet, — which might make a difference. Upon the whole, the case appeared involved in such doubt, and there was so much to be said on both sides, that it was a great relief to Mrs. Pomfret's mind when, upon reference to a peerage, at Miss Pringle's suggestion, the table of precedence gave it triumphantly in her favour.

When the men came up-stairs, Miss Marston was asked to sing or play, and upon her declining, on the score that her musical capacity was small, and only fit for home consumption, Kate sat down to accompany her cousin Julian, whose playing on the French horn was renowned, it appeared. With that happy, careless manner of his, he rose from Miss Marston's side on the sofa, and induced his long legs to carry him in the direction of the piano, where Kate had been sitting ready for some minutes. Then, out of a rosewood casket, he drew a beautifully finished silver horn. Now, about this instrument there are differences of taste; some persons are dead to the charm of trumpets: but few women, at least, are dead to the charm of a good-looking man exhaling his very soul, apparently, in long-drawn cadences, with grace and gentleman-like propriety. "Mr. Westbrook's playing is so soft!" — "So much feeling!" Those were the phrases one heard passed round the room, from all the pretty lips present. It was hard if so handsome a man, playing with such expression, should not be allowed a few false notes. And, to say the truth, he did not deny himself this luxury, occasionally.

While Julian is playing "Ange si pur" with impassioned pathos, and eyebrows that rise and fall in sympathy with the emotions of each bar, Rupert has sat down by the little quiet school-girl, who is wondering if any one will ever speak to her in her far-off corner of the room. He has found her out, however. Perhaps he wants to talk to her of her sister, who is engaged at the piano? Mrs. Pomfret makes up her mind that this must be the case. She fails to elicit much corroboration of this view, however, when she questions little Mary that night, in her room. The girl thinks it was so kind of Mr. Marston to come and sit by her when she was all alone; and he is so nice, and so handsome, and he talked so pleasantly! But it does not appear that sister Kate's name was mentioned between the two.

The little school-girl will think of that evening for a long time. The young man will go away, and forget all about it, the moral of which is that little school-girls had better not be brought down to fill up empty places at dinner.

Lionel, the whole of this evening, was a despair to Mrs. Pomfret. Now was the opportunity, when Olivia was sitting on the sofa, with a place unoccupied beside her, and Julian was busy with his French horn, for Lionel to redeem his character. Finding that no telegraphic signals produced any effect upon her son, his mother took the extreme measure of crossing the room to implore him to "go and be civil" to Miss Marston.

"I can't, ma. She ain't one of my sort. She regularly sews me up."

"'Sews you up!' Nonsense, Lionel. Don't talk in that absurd way — and do have a little more self-confidence, my dear boy. She's a most charming girl, and I'm sure not the least shy. Just look how Julian and she have been talking. Do go and say something."

"I haven't got Julian's cheek, ma. He's so deuced cheeky, he is. And then he has always lots of chaff ready. I haven't any. I like a jolly woman, that'll help a fellow on a bit — not such a swell as that gal is. It's no use, ma — I can't go and talk — I don't know what to say."

With a heavy sigh the maternal Macchiavelli heaved herself away towards Olivia's sofa. She must trust to time and accident, she saw. Yet a judicious word might not be out of place.

"My dear boy," she whispered, sinking into the cushions at Olivia's side, "is so very diffident — does himself so little justice. No one knows the stores of his mind — the refinement of his nature — for he never shows himself as he really is, Miss Marston. And then he is so afraid of not pleasing, of being thought forward and so on, that when he admires any one very much, he is always more silent than ever — remains at a distance, and shows to the worst advantage. It is such a pity, isn't it?"

"Ah! a great pity."

Olivia was listening to "Ange si pur," and thinking of the last time she heard it, at Lisbon, in the "Favorite." She scarcely heard a word of the sibilant Mrs. Pomfret was pouring into her ear.

"Some people have the capacity of making the most of their gifts — like Julian," continued his aunt; "and those people of course get on in a way that poor Lionel, I fear, never will. It is wonderful how Julian has got on! But then he has no diffidence to stand in his way — such an advantage. Plays charmingly, doesn't he? — so soft. Some women, however, do not like quite so much à plomb — they prefer a little more diffidence in a man — and indeed there is no doubt that the most valuable qualities are not those which show themselves on the surface, however attractive it may make people in society."

But now "Ange si pur" had come to an end; the last spasm of the eyebrows had subsided; the silver horn dropped amidst a murmur of applause, and Mrs. Pomfret called out,

"That is quite beautiful, my dear Julian, but you mustn't leave off. They've just begun another rubber of whist. Do pray give us something else. What is that beautiful thing we heard the other night at the concert — sung by that pretty woman — don't you remember?"

"'Robert, toi qui j'aime,' mamma," said Kate. "Have you got it arranged, Julian?"

"No," he answered, shortly; "I haven't."

"I wish you'd get it, Julian," said his aunt, "I never heard anything more thrilling than it was, as that Mrs. —, what was her name? sang it, with such intense passion. You must remember, Julian, for you were quite excited while she was singing. A very pretty woman, and such a voice. I have it ringing in my ears, now."

"It requires a woman's voice to give that song effect," said the horn-player, indifferently. "Here, Kate, let us try the 'Trovatore.'"

"By all means. Elliston was the woman's name, mamma. She is a beginner, I suppose, for I have never seen her name anywhere else. You promised, next time we saw it down for a concert, that you would go."

"Come, Kate, let us begin," said her cousin, impatiently.

As the party from the Cedars were driving home that evening, Miss Pringle was loud in praise of the delightful evening they had passed.

"Nothing could be more agreeable than Sir James Yellowly during dinner — so chatty. And our rubber really quite reminded me of Harrowgate — so very pleasant. Mr. Pomfret is a perfect gentleman, and a very steady nice player, and he complimented me upon my play. We won two rubbers, Olivia. As to that Captain Bagshott, he may be a very gallant officer, but I'm very glad he wasn't my partner, that's all. He revoked twice. I hope you amused yourself, my dear. I pitied you going in with that horrid, vulgar eldest son — the only one of the family that is objectionable, eh?" (The fact is, she had overheard Lionel ask his mother, "Who is that little old party in a yellow wig?" Miss Pringle never could forget this. But for this, she would have warmly encouraged Mrs. Pomfret's maternal scheme, no doubt; as it was, she never could endure his name henceforward.) "However," she continued, "you were not dependent on him, I was glad to see. The big man seemed to make himself pleasant, didn't he? But do you like all that trumpeting in a room? I'm not very musical, you know, so I'm no judge. I remember a man once playing a horn or something under my window, and though of course it was gratifying, I thought it a horrid bore; and really in a room, I think it reminds one of being in a stage-coach."

"Mr. Westbrook plays with a great deal of expression," said Olivia; "I liked it so much. It's a pity that he isn't always quite in tune, perhaps."

"Always?" said Rupert, laughing. "My dear Olivia, 'the wind bloweth where it listeth' in that man's horn."

I don't fancy his look at all, and I think his playing quite as great an infliction as Aunt Clo does."

"I'm not so fastidious as you are about music, fortunately. I believe I can get pleasure out of what isn't first-rate."

"Then the fellow's such a prig. I hate his looks."

"You know nothing but his looks, do you? You didn't talk to him. If you had, you'd have found him very pleasant, and not at all conceited."

"That's what women always think when a man takes the trouble of being agreeable to them. I never saw a fellow give himself greater airs. Did you notice his manner to his aunt and cousins? Such a cool hand."

"I don't know about that. I didn't shake hands with him," laughed his sister. "I only know that if you'd had Mr. Lionel Pomfret sitting on one side of you at dinner, you'd have been glad to find any one as agreeable as Mr. Westbrook on the other."

"Young Pomfret doesn't look as if he'd set the Thames on fire — but his sisters are niceish girls — the youngest is a pretty little thing. I like the family altogether better than I expected."

Aunt Clo was dozing audibly in a corner of the carriage, or she would not have allowed such tame praise to pass unchallenged.

CHAPTER VI.

Anxieties.

RUPERT MARSTON'S anxieties had been allayed upon the subject of Lozados, or, it may be supposed, he would hardly have entered so readily into the humours of the Pomfret entertainment. But his father's old friends, De Castro and Montalba, as well as other Portuguese whom he had consulted, laughed to scorn the idea of the great Lisbon house being in a critical condition. They assured him — and had they not been in business all their lives? — that such reports were not unfrequently set afloat, to serve some particular end. They knew there were "bears" in this case, who were trying to depreciate the market of Portuguese stock. Lozados was no mercantile gambler — no successful man of yesterday, whom a chance might ruin, as a chance had made. His credit was consolidated by half a century of steadfast respectability, by the uprightness of his dealings, the shrewdness of his intellect, and, above all, by his abstinence from all speculation. Rupert was only too glad to believe that the warnings of Mr. Claxton and other English friends had no other foundation than the wise general principle, that an excessive rate of interest paid upon capital indicates a corresponding amount of insecurity. As he could not bring his father to admit this, he wisely put the subject away from his mind as much as possible.

The intimacy between the Pomfrets and Mr. Marston's family ripened in a way that was not foreseen or sought, and could scarcely be accounted for by

Olivia and her brother. The strong will of the mother on the one side, who lost no opportunity of cultivating this intimacy, and the readiness of the aunt to embrace such, on the other, were the two motive powers that brought about this result. Upon some pretext or other no three days elapsed without an interchange of notes, a visit, a walk together, a party made up to some exhibition in London, an evening spent at the Park, or one of the few favoured houses in the neighbourhood which Mrs. Pomfret patronised. It followed that Olivia saw very much more than Rupert of their new friends. Except in the case of their evening meetings, which with all Mrs. Pomfret's best endeavours could only be occasional, the young man of business was of course absent. The flame which the anxious mother flattered herself was lit that first evening did not burn as vigorously as could be wished; yet, Heaven knows, it was not for want of fanning. Rupert accepted their invitations, and went with them to the opera. He talked and laughed with Kate, as in duty bound; indeed, he thought her a very nice girl; but he went no further. He was not the least bit in love, though poor Mrs. Pomfret still tried hard to persuade herself that this was the case. Unfortunately there was another heart concerned in the matter, which anxious mammas in like circumstances are apt to forget. Kate was not yet a blasée young lady; she had been out a couple of years, but had seen few men in any degree of intimacy. This young and good-looking man, she was now, for three or four months, seeing very often. It was small wonder that though Rupert's attitude remained unchanged, the girl was gradually falling in love, or fancying herself so, which, for the time being, at all events, came to the same thing. Foolish Mrs. Pomfret!

Towards Olivia, therefore, from different motives, the feelings of both mother and daughter were drawn. They neither of them relaxed their efforts to win her friendship; and to such a measure of that sentiment as springs from gratitude for kindness they attained. She felt, indeed, a lively desire to respond to their warm demonstrations of affection. The circle of her friends had hitherto been so limited, especially among women, that she could not remain untouched by the efforts of mother and daughter to break through the cold ground of acquaintance, and draw closer to her. Most people with any power of attraction about them have known what it was to meet with some enthusiastic admirer, who by the sheer strength with which he fastens and holds on to their friendship, leaves them without the power to shake him away. This was pretty much the case with Olivia and her new friends. Kate was very commonplace, but she was a blind worshipper of Olivia's, partly, no doubt, in consequence of Rupert. Mrs. Pomfret's was even a more genuine admiration. Quite apart from the insane idea which possessed her of forcing a wife upon her son, and the many advantages which Miss Marston united for the part of daughter-in-law, the elder lady had that perception of Olivia's character, which a lower nature, coming in contact with a higher one, occasionally obtains. There was no one point of resemblance between them; but this, though it might render sympathy difficult on Olivia's part, was certainly an additional attraction in Mrs. Pomfret's eyes. She was so far removed from a dull woman that she knew her own shortcomings, and could appreciate qualities to which she was unaccustomed. Olivia's simplicity and unworldliness, her unselfishness, and the absence in her of all pretension, all effort to attract admiration, were great charms in Mrs. Pomfret's eyes.

"That girl will be the making of Lionel," said the worthy mother one night to her husband. "She is a true lady, Pomfret; that is what Olivia Marston is, and what Lionel wants, to draw him out properly. Mark my words, he will be a different man when they've been married a year."

"But, my dear, it seems to me — eh? — that he doesn't fancy the girl. He doesn't speak half a dozen words to her when she is here, and I don't think ever calls there. You know best, my dear, I dare say; but it does seem to me that there is no chance of this coming to pass, at present, a bit more than there was of his marrying Miss Wilde last year, or Miss —"

"Oh, Pomfret, don't revert to that, please. I'm quite ashamed of myself when I think of my having wanted him to marry that girl. It was all my horrid worldliness; there was nothing but her connection to recommend her. This is a very different case. The man who gets Olivia Marston, I don't care who he is, if he's a duke's eldest son, Pomfret, he is a lucky man. And I don't despair. She is getting accustomed to us now, and there's nothing like a girl getting to know a man's family well. She knows what she has got to look to. I confess it will require management, Pomfret — a good deal of management — but that, you know, I'm accustomed to. And for my dear boy, I do feel it is a prize worth trying for."

"If I were to offer an opinion," said Mr. Pomfret, hesitatingly, and, as usual, with great deference to his better half, "it would be that Lionel has no chance — even if he were to try, which he doesn't — as long as Julian is always here. You shouldn't ask him quite so often, if you want to get Lionel to talk to the girl, my dear. It's no business of mine, of course; I merely offer an opinion. But it seems to me that Miss Marston finds Julian a very agreeable fellow, as, indeed, he is; but it isn't your boy's game, that's all."

"Well, Pomfret, Julian is your nephew, remember, and has been brought up like one of ourselves here. He has always come down whenever he likes, and I don't see how I can stop his visits suddenly. Besides, my dear, with all his faults (and I know he is horridly selfish and a mauvais soojet), Julian is immensely useful, and I shouldn't like to throw him over quite. But I told Olivia Marston at the very first, and I have repeated it constantly since, that Julian isn't a marrying man. I told her about that affair two years ago, and how many other scrapes he had been in altogether; in short, I thought it right to open her eyes about him. Olivia is a very superior girl. I'm not afraid of her falling in love with him. She likes him very well to talk to, and that is all, depend on it."

"Oh, my dear, I dare say you're right," said Mr. Pomfret, as he turned round and fell asleep.

This, then, was the state of things at the end of three months from the day Miss Marston first dined at Caverton Park. How far Mrs. Pomfret was justified in the interpretation we have just heard her give of the young lady's feelings towards Julian Westbrook will be seen presently.

Rupert found himself in the same railway-carriage with Lionel and two of his choice companions, one evening, on his way from town. The young men were discussing Julian, by no means a favourite with any of them, when Rupert entered the carriage.

"Such a chap for women! always in a mess with one or other. He went on like anything last year with a gal at Brighton, and then walked off as cool. D'you remember, too, that little actress he was so sweet on, two years ago? By Jove! that was near being a pretty kettle of fish. He was awfully spoony."

"But she was married!"

"That was what saved him, man! Why, bless you, you didn't think Julian was over particular about the seventh commandment, did you? Bill says that he was very near having to fight a duel at Baden last year about a Rooshian princess. I can't think what the women see about him, for my part, only he's such a lot of brass."

That was pretty much Rupert's unexpressed opinion, too. His bile rose whenever he found himself in this man's company. He could be lenient — knowing his own weakness, how could he be otherwise? — to the follies of passion; but to the systematic vice and heartless trifling, begotten of vanity alone, he was utterly pitiless.

It is a June morning. At the Cedars breakfast is just over, and Olivia comes out upon the terrace looking as fresh in her muslin dress as the rose she stoops to gather. Then she looks out to the river between the black arms of the Cedars, and now to the pea-green fields beyond, where the buttercups shine like specks of gold in the glittering sunlight, and nature stares out as hard and vividly brilliant as the crudest pre-Raphaelite picture.

Suddenly, between those fields and her, the sharp prow of a boat is seen parting the swift-flowing waters of the river. Then the single figure in this "outrigger" becomes visible, plying a long, slow, vigorous stroke, that sends the foam-flakes flying from his oar. And then, by a neatly-executed manœuvre, the boat, obeying the hand of its master, runs into a little creek at the foot of the Cedars garden. Olivia has recognised the boat and its occupant. He has more than once paid visits thus, whereby the village and neighbourhood have lost the opportunity of discussing why Mr. Westbrook's horse should be seen so often turning in at the gate of the Cedars. Never before, however, has he called so early. Olivia wonders what has brought him at this hour, and remembers, with some annoyance, that Rupert, whose prejudice against Westbrook is still great, has been detained an hour later than usual, and is still in the house. The tall, strong figure of the rower, a loose jacket thrown over his striped jersey, his face and hands tanned already many degrees browner than when we saw him in the spring, comes with its long indolent gait swinging up across the lawn towards the terrace where Olivia stands. She does not call her aunt or retire, as most properly bred young ladies would think it necessary to do. She simply sits down.

"I am an early visitor, Miss Marston; excuse me. I am rowing part of the way up to Windsor, and stopped to ask you a question on the way. The Guards have a ball there next week. Will you go, if I get you and your aunt an invitation? I am sure I can manage it, and I think you would be amused. Do say 'Yes.'"

Olivia shook her head and smiled.

"Such dissipations are quite out of my line. Do you know, I have never been to a ball."

"So much the better. Make a beginning now, then."

"The quiet old house wouldn't know what to make of it if I were to be away all night. No, you mustn't tempt me."

"But why not? Surely you don't want to lead this monastic life for ever? Your father can't object, I'm sure."

"Bless me, Mr. Westbrook!" exclaimed Aunt Clo, suddenly coming out from the drawing-room, with her knitting in her hand, "who'd have thought of seeing you? Well, this is an unexpected pleasure! I heard voices, and thought I'd just see who it was. Dear me! what a heat you're in. Have you asked Mr. Westbrook if he would take anything, Olivia?"

"Nothing," said Julian, quickly, before Olivia could reply; "I only came to offer you and Miss Marston tickets for the Guards' ball at Windsor next week. Several of them are great friends of mine, and I know I could get tickets; but your niece declines."

"Declines!" cried Miss Pringle. "Gracious goodness, Olivia, why on earth should you decline Mr. Westbrook's very civil offer? I'm sure, when I was a girl, I should have jumped at it; and, indeed, though I no longer dance (I have given it up for the last year or two, though people told me there was no necessity for it), still, I confess, I should enjoy going to the ball vastly."

"Well, dear aunt, you can go," said Olivia, with a sly smile at the corners of her mouth, as she glanced towards Julian. "There is nothing to prevent you, that I know of, if Mr. Westbrook procures you the invitation. By-the-by," she added, "of course I need not ask if the Pomfrets are going. Kate enjoys a ball so much."

"Well," said Westbrook, colouring slightly, "at present I haven't asked for invitations for them; but if you go, I'll try and manage to get tickets for my aunt and Kate. As to Lionel, of course it is out of the question."

"Mr. Westbrook, you ought to get your aunt and cousin tickets before any one else. As to myself——"

"Don't be absurd!" struck in Aunt Clo. "I shall tell your papa, Olivia, and then you will be made to accept, as you were about the opera, which I am sure we enjoyed vastly, Mr. Westbrook, thanks to you. Why, when your papa is in bed and asleep, child, what is there to prevent your being at a ball?"

Olivia hesitated a moment.

"I don't know what Rupert may think about it; I could not accept without consulting him. Will there be an invitation for my brother also, Mr. Westbrook?"

"I am almost afraid not. I will manage it if I can; but men's invitations are more difficult to get, as you can understand."

"At all events," she said, in her quick, decisive way, "I am quite resolved upon one point. I cannot think of accepting this invitation at your hands until the Pomfrets have been invited first. I will speak to Rupert in the meantime."

Westbrook did not relish this ultimatum, and Aunt Clo tried to overrule it, but Olivia was firm. Promising to call the following day, the young man shook hands with both ladies, and trailed lazily back across the lawn towards his boat. The next moment Rupert came out upon the terrace. Aunt Clo began with volubility to explain the object of Westbrook's early visit. But the brother, drawing his sister's hand within his arm, walked slowly away down the terrace-walk, without replying to Aunt Clo's eager demand for his approval of the ball project.

"I don't like that fellow's coming here so much, Olivia."

"You hear what it was brought him now? — to offer to get us tickets for the Guards' ball at Windsor."

"You did not accept, I hope?" he said, sharply.

"Well, no; I said I would speak to you. My father, I know, will urge my going, if Aunt Clo speaks to him about it. Of course I shouldn't go unless you had an invitation, and would go too."

"Then you may be very sure I shall not do that, on any invitation of Westbrook's."

"Why not?" asked Olivia, colouring.

"Why not! Because I hate the fellow. I haven't the least objection to the ball itself. If you can get an invitation by any other means, you shall go; but I have every objection to your owing your invitation to that fellow — to your being seen much with him — to your putting yourself under any sort of obligation to him. I think it would be a disadvantage to you, Olivia, for it to be said that he was paying you attention. He has done so to heaps of other girls, and I don't choose you to be cast in with the lot of those he has flirted and amused himself with, and forgotten — though even that I should think a less misfortune, almost, than your marrying him, if there was the least chance of such a thing."

"There is no such chance," said Olivia, impatiently; "but why are you so prejudiced? It is unworthy of you, Rupert."

"Because, I tell you, I have a bad opinion of him."

"But why? You go on repeating those vague rumours — do you absolutely know the truth of any of them? I hate stabbing in the dark."

"His reputation is well known. Besides, any one with any knowledge of the world can see what sort of man he is."

"I have no knowledge of the world. Of course I can see that he has had much to spoil him, but I think there is a great deal of good in him, nevertheless. He seems so susceptible to good influence. I fancy he has never known what it was to be really attached to any one yet."

"And therefore you think there are excuses to be made for him? If you judged quite dispassionately, Olivia, you would not think so. The man will never be really attached to any woman — it isn't in him. He's vain and selfish, and he has made many a woman miserable by his good looks and his plausible smooth tongue. I have made it my business to inquire about him, and I have learnt quite enough to justify the antipathy I felt towards him from the very first. I know the sort of man so well!" he added vehemently, digging the end of his stick, as he spoke, into the lawn on which they were walking.

"His aunt spares no pains to let one know her nephew's shortcomings, but as she always contrasts them with her son's perfections, I don't pay much attention to her. Mrs. Pomfret is a very good woman, and I am sensible of all her kindness to me — but upon some subjects she is quite demented."

Olivia said this because she was confident that it was from Mrs. Pomfret that Rupert had heard so much to Westbrook's disadvantage; and because she felt resentful of this particular mode of pushing her son's interest, which the good lady was disposed to employ.

"I don't listen to women's gossip," replied Marston, disdainfully. "A man's character is generally judged pretty fairly by his fellow men. Westbrook has few staunch friends — he has plenty of intimate acquaintances. He is looked upon as very good company — light in hand, agreeable, a thorough man of the world. No human being would ever think of sending for him in sickness, or applying to him in any strait whatever; and though I have met with many men who said they 'liked' him, I have never met one who deluded himself into the belief that if he were to die to-morrow, Westbrook would care one straw."

"I think you are wrong, Rupert, — I think you are quite wrong as to his having no feeling," returned his sister, warmly. "From all I have ever heard him say —"

"Ay — that's it. He talks sentiment beautifully, doesn't he? Give me a man's actions to judge him by. This fellow, Olivia, is quite unworthy of you. Take care before it is too late — and you make yourself and my father and me miserable."

She checked the words which rose to her lips, and was silent for a moment or two. Then she raised her face to his, and kissed him.

"Your anxiety about me makes you exaggerate everything, dear boy. There is no danger of this coming to pass. I'm not vain enough to fancy, because Mr. Westbrook has paid me a little attention, that I am the one favoured woman who has at last secured the affections of this very volatile gentleman. Your fears are quite premature."

"That may be — I hope it is so — but that doesn't alter the case. You like him — you don't deny it. You won't believe a word against him. Who shall say that while this fellow 'means nothing,' as the phrase goes, — while he thinks it fine fun to be amusing himself with a girl who knows nothing of the world, you may gradually fall in love — and —"

"I should have thought you knew me better than to have any fear of that sort," said Olivia.

"Well, supposing, for argument's sake, that he really loves you, and asks you to be his wife, are you prepared to refuse him?"

"Certainly I am — at present" (the words were more assured than the manner). "I don't know enough of him. I like him, that's all. You know, too, that, as long as my father lives, I shall never leave him. It is a charge our beloved mother gave me when she died — and Mr. Westbrook is not likely to take a wife under such circumstances. Fancy such a gay man leading what he calls our 'monastic life!'" She smiled. "You see I have no delusion about him, only I think you are unjust — very unjust. I am sure he is not heartless, as you say."

"Will you promise to be guided by me, Olivia, in this matter? I am so little at home, and Aunt Clo is such a goose, that it must be left to your own good sense to follow or not to follow my advice. Discourage this fellow's visits here. Have as little to say to him as possible. I tell you fairly that he and I never will be, never can be, friends. I can't prevent your seeing him, if you choose, but I enter my most decided protest against it — and against your accepting invitations, or anything else at his hands."

Olivia saw her father in the distance approaching them. She hastened, with a voice that shook a little, to put an end to this discussion.

"You mustn't talk like that, Rupert, Whom have I to look to but you? Of course, if his coming is to bring trouble between us two, why — he mustn't come any more, I suppose."

Mr. Marston, leaning upon the arm of his old servant, at this moment came up.

"Who's this? You, Olivia, eh? And Rupert? — not gone to town yet — how come you to be so late? There — that'll do — don't shake my hand off, boy. Oh, I'm pretty well — as well as a man can be in such weather. Upon my soul it's as black as ink to-day! and we are in the middle of June. You haven't written my journal yet, Olivia. No one is going to town in such weather, of course, eh?"

"No, father, — no one but Rupert — unless Aunt Clo has a fly in the afternoon."

"Oh, she can have a fly — that doesn't take out my horses. I can't have the carriage out in such fogs — have the panels smashed to bits. By-the-bye, I met your aunt coming out — what's this she was talking about — a ball, or something, eh? You must go, child. You mustn't stay away on my account, remember, or I shall be very angry — not but what balls are poor amusements, I think — a parcel of foolish boys and girls jumping about; but if it amuses you ——”

“No, dear father, I have decided not to go.” And Olivia glanced up at her brother. “I assure you my decision has nothing to do with you, but under the circumstances I know I should not enjoy the ball.”

Mr. Marston did not further press the point, and the subject dropped. A minute after, Rupert kissed his sister, as they reached the steps of the terrace, and hurried through the house on his way to town.

An hour or two later, when the day's Times had been read, and the journal written, Olivia came out once more upon the terrace steps, with a blotting-case in her hand, and drawing a chair towards her little table, she sat for some minutes with her elbows on her knees, turning over in her mind how she could best express that which she had to say. A soft summer breeze from the river wafted up to her the sweet breath of honeysuckle, and jasmine, and clove pinks that grew under the wall. From their dove-cote, in the big elm, whose leaves were flickering in the light wind and sunshine, her doves were cooing their low monotonous measure, so full of pleasantness and peace. Olivia laid her pen down, and let herself drift upon a stream of thought.

What was her real feeling towards Julian Westbrook? How far had her liking for his society carried her? In spite of what she had said to her brother, she was not quite sure herself upon these points. Sometimes she almost thought — she half feared — that she was a little in love. Her imagination was dazzled — her heart bewildered by the devotion of the first very attractive man it had fallen into her lot to meet. Her powers of comparison, be it remembered, were reduced to the narrowest compass by the singularly isolated life she had led. She could not gauge him by other men; she only knew that he was infinitely the pleasantest person she had ever seen much of. With all her love for Rupert, Olivia was aware that he was often prejudiced. He loathed "a fine gentleman;" and Westbrook's cool, free and easy manners had predisposed Rupert to believe the evil he had heard of him. This Olivia felt: and demurred in consequence, at accepting, as true, all her brother said to Julian's disadvantage. Yet he had spoken positively; and he knew life, which she did not.

But on one point she had no hesitation. She remained firm in her resolution to discourage Westbrook's further advances. Indeed, circumstanced as she was, she had scarcely a choice in the matter, it seemed to her. Her love for her brother was, after her devotion to her father, the next strongest passion in her heart. This she never doubted. Whatever her feeling towards Westbrook might ripen into, if fostered, it had not yet mastered those early affections, which had grown with her growth, and had been all in all to her, hitherto. Since Rupert was so dead set against him, Westbrook's intimacy with her should cease. For the present, at all events, she must see as little of him as possible. For Westbrook's sake, this was but right; and it was wise for her own. Who could tell but that, by and by, Rupert might change or modify his opinion of this man's falsity and wickedness? And then, why, if so perhaps —

What she at last wrote ran thus:

"DEAR MR. WESTBROOK, — In order to save time, as well as to prevent your having the trouble of calling here to-morrow, I write to say that I find it is not in my power to accept the invitation you were kind enough to offer to procure for me, so you must think no more about it. Do not think me impertinent, however, if I express a hope that you will exert the same interest to secure your aunt and cousin invitations that you kindly proposed using for me. They would justly feel hurt otherwise.

"I remain, dear Mr. Westbrook,

"Very truly yours,

"OLIVIA MARSTON."

In spite of this, Julian Westbrook called at the Cedars next day. He was not admitted. The following morning Olivia received these lines:

"DEAR MISS MARSTON, — I am sorry your brother should have prevented your accepting the invitation which it would have given me great pleasure to have procured for you. As your absence will rob the ball of its only attraction to me, I shall not go. You will understand, therefore, that it would be impossible for me to ask for invitations for my relations when I shall not be there to present them, in person. Trusting that I may be fortunate enough to find you at home some day this week, believe me to be very sincerely yours,

"JULIAN WESTBROOK."

Had Rupert seen this note, he would not have failed to detect one thing which, not unnaturally, escaped Olivia. The thing to be detected, and which all Julian's astuteness would not have hidden from Rupert, was this: that, whereas Westbrook would have liked the éclat of introducing a handsome distinguished-looking girl to his fine Guardsmen friends, he shrank from being seen with rather a vulgar-looking aunt, and very ordinary first cousin.

But, for all that, Rupert was wrong in his estimate of Julian's character — wrong, at least, in one respect. He was capable of a strong, if selfish, passion: and Olivia Marston had aroused this, in a measure which surprised the blasé man of the world himself.

CHAPTER VII.

A Proposal.

THERE had been a heavy thunderstorm, with wind, in the morning; followed by torrents of rain. About two, it cleared off, and blue sky showed; but great pools of water lay in the gravel walks, and the hopping of the birds (who were now singing loudly again) from branch to branch, shook down a shower of large drops, every moment.

The garden was in this condition, when Olivia came out, with her basket on her arm, and her gown tucked up, to see what damage the storm had done to her flowers. She stood tying up a rose-tree, which the wind had broken away from the trellis, round the front-door porch; getting, for her benefit, a rain of little pearls upon her upturned face, from the large shining leaves: and, while thus engaged, she heard the shrubbery gate opened, and the sound of a horse's hoofs upon the wet gravel behind her. She did not turn round, though she knew at once who it was; but it was too late to retreat. By the time she had finished tying up the rose, Westbrook was close to her.

"I am fortunate to have found you, at last," he said. "I have called twice lately, and almost began to think you never meant to admit me again. However, this wet day, I thought you could hardly get farther than your garden."

"Did you start in the rain?" she said; "I am afraid you must have got wet."

Her manner had something of its old shyness: for she felt uncomfortable: it seemed so inhuman not to ask him in, after his wet ride!

"Yes, I got a little wet, but nothing to signify. I am repaid by finding you." There was a pause; and then he said, "I will take my horse round to the stable, if I may?"

She coloured, and, for a moment, knew not what to reply. "If you will go in, you will find my aunt. Perhaps you will have a glass of wine?"

She pulled out a piece of wire from her basket, and turned to busy herself again with her rose-tree. He looked keenly at her: then he replied, in his careless off-hand way,

"No, if you are going to remain out here, I'll ——"

"I am going into the village as soon as I have done tying up this rose," she said quickly, her face still turned away.

There was no mistaking this. He was too gentlemanlike to insist further — and not to show that he understood her hint. He had recourse to what is so invaluable in such emergencies — he sighed deeply.

She had finished fastening up the tree now; and, more by way of something to do, in this awkward silence, than for any other reason, she cut off three or four roses, and put them into her basket. She felt so sorry for him:—it was very distressing—but what could she say? It was more honest to let him, at once, know the footing on which he must be, henceforward.

Westbrook looked very much annoyed; but he was equal to the emergency. With nineteen-twentieths of his women-acquaintances he would have masked his annoyance, and made a careless remark or two upon some indifferent topic. But this was not the game to be played with Olivia. He remained silent, until she turned towards him. He was leaning against the saddle, with the bridle thrown over his arm, as she looked up. It was a graceful attitude, and I dare say Westbrook knew the advantages of his position, as he bent his handsome eyes reproachfully on Olivia.

“Will you give me one of those roses, to take back with me to London?” he asked, in a low voice.

It seemed impossible to refuse; it was attaching too much importance to a trifle: yet the moment after she had given the flower, she half regretted that she had done so. For he murmured,

“I shall always keep this rose.”

“Flowers gathered when they are wet, never last,” she replied. “Shall I ring for the groom to take your horse, Mr. Westbrook?”

“Thank you, I won’t disturb Miss Pringle,” he said, with a slightly sarcastic inflection. “I shall ride back to town straight, as you—are going out, Miss Marston. Shall you be at the Pomfrets' on Tuesday evening?"

"I — I don't know. I hardly think so. It is a dance, is it not? That is quite out of our line."

"But now that you have once broken through your habits of seclusion ——"

"Oh! we shall return to them, I think."

"Do you, then, really dislike society?"

"No; but as my brother" — she stopped short, and felt herself colouring; but, resolved, in some modified way or other, to get out what she wanted to say, she went on — "as my brother doesn't care about it, I think we shall go to the Pomfrets much less often, in future, than we have lately done."

"Oh! of course, I was aware that Marston had a good deal to do in the change of your views," he said quietly.

"Good-bye, Mr. Westbrook; I must be going."

She held out her hand, and turned quickly down a narrow footpath, to the right, where he could not follow.

How handsome he was! She felt very sorry for him. She could not believe all that Rupert said. She was sure he was to be pitied: there was something in his voice and manner, when he was softened, as he was just now, that was very interesting. It had only been by a hard struggle that she had managed, throughout that short interview, to maintain the cold demeanour she had assumed.

After all, Rupert decided, that evening, when his sister asked him, that she had better go to the Pomfrets' on Tuesday. "It will give rise to questions — conjectures — Heaven knows what, if you refuse, and suddenly leave off going to them, after your intimacy of late."

"And what am I to do, if Mr. Westbrook asks me to dance?"

"You can dance with him once—it would be remarked if you didn't: but find some excuse to avoid dancing more with him."

The Tuesday came—a lovely June evening. It was but a small party; a few of the smarter neighbours, and a sprinkling of men from London; some five-and-thirty in all, and most of them dancers. There was a man at the piano, and tea in the library: and at twelve o'clock, the dining-room was opened, and a handsome supper was "discovered"—as they say in play-books. Just before this Julian had been waltzing with Olivia. He said very little—and he waltzed to perfection: under the circumstances, it was all that could be desired.

When the waltz was over, they found that every one who had not been dancing was gone into supper. They went as far as the door of the dining-room, but there was no room for them at the table. Olivia saw Aunt Clo, with a mass of golden, quivering jelly before her, and Sir James Yellowly beside her, filling her champagne-glass; and a little lower down, Rupert, looking very benevolent, with little Mary at his side, whom he had made happy by taking into supper.

"Since there is no room for us here, let us go into the conservatory," said Westbrook. "It will be cooler than these rooms."

Two or three other couples were wandering on before them in the same direction. Olivia thought it best to follow these, instead of sitting alone with Westbrook in the drawing-room. The cool green twilight — for the only illumination was a Chinese lantern or two, shining like glow-worms among the orange-trees — and the trickling of a fountain, among shells and ferns, were refreshing after the heat and glare of the gas-lighted rooms.

Lionel Pomfret, arm-in-arm with a friend, and in a close, whispered conversation, passed them.

"Can you keep a secret?" asked Westbrook of Olivia, smiling, when the two young men were gone by.

"I have had so few to keep in my life that I can't tell. But as they say no woman can, I am glad I have never been tried. I'm sure I am no wiser or stronger than the rest of my sex."

"Shall I tell you something about my fascinating cousin there, on condition that you'll promise not to betray me?"

"Thank you, I'm not the least curious about him."

"But it concerns you — indirectly, at least."

"Concerns me!" and Olivia opened her eyes wide.

"Yes. Of course you know my aunt's wishes? She does not make much mystery about them. Well, what she, poor woman, doesn't yet know is that her charming son and heir has engaged himself to Miss Julia Roper."

"I am very sorry indeed to hear it." The next minute she added, quickly, "For your uncle and aunt's sake. I'm so sorry for their annoyance, as I know the young lady is not exactly what they would like for a daughter-in-law."

She's really quite good enough for him. You mustn't believe all you hear. In a neighbourhood like this there is no end to the gossip."

"She may be good enough for Mr. Lionel Pomfret, but not for his mother and sisters, I think."

"Oh, you are prejudiced by my aunt, who says all sorts of ill-natured things about the girl, because she is not in Fordingham society. I assure you there's nothing against her, except her vulgarity."

"I dare say not. I know nothing about her; but her appearance is not prepossessing. As to gossip, I never believe one half of what I hear."

"Are you sure of that? For instance, you have heard a good deal about me, I suspect?"

He bent his face, and tried to see into her eyes. She raised them, and looked at him steadily for a moment; then turned her head away, without a word.

"Miss Marston, what have you heard? Tell me frankly. Do not judge me too harshly before you hear my defence."

"How can I judge you at all? What can a girl know about a man's life? She has nothing but her instinct to guide her as to his character, or the truth of anything she hears about him."

"Shall I say that her instinct is always right, or that it is apt to mislead her?" thought Julian. He could not make up his mind, so he cast that aside, and said —

"A man is often unjustly taxed with things which it was impossible he could avoid — which the force of circumstances have drawn him into. He is thrown, let us say, into close intimacy with a girl, about whom, at first, he conceives a very erroneous impression. On knowing more of her, he sees that she is the last person to make him happy — that they are quite unsuited to each other. The world instantly raises an outcry against him: calls him a flirt — a male jilt — all sorts of ugly names; when, really, he has been guilty of nothing worse than a want of due caution — for how can a man know anything of a girl until he talks to her?"

"You know how to put things very cleverly, Mr. Westbrook," replied Olivia, with a half-smile, half-frown. "You ought to be a lawyer; I can't argue with you; still, I know, that though there may be some truth in what you say, it is not the whole truth. But, indeed, I had rather not discuss the subject. I'm sure I don't want to judge any one. The only impartial judge of any action in this life, I think, is one's own conscience — one's own standard of right and wrong."

"Exactly, and your standard is perhaps not precisely that of a man of the world."

How distinctly she remembered those words long afterwards, together with the whole scene: the dim green light; the trickling of the water through shells, and the soft splash into its basin; the perfumed breath of orange-flowers; and the handsome face bent over her!

"Women, you see, substitute Conscience for Honour," he said, again.

"And not a bad substitute, either," she replied.

"Perhaps so — for them. But depend on it, that in many cases where there is a loud outcry against evil-doers, if you could know all the circumstances —"

"Ah, you always return to circumstances."

"Because women, being exposed to so many fewer temptations than we are, are apt to judge us uncharitably."

"Where is the boasted superiority of men, if they are not stronger to resist temptation? Why should there be a separate code for men and for women? I am no champion of my sex. I believe that men were meant to be our superiors in all ways. If they are good men, I am sure they are so. But when you speak of women being uncharitable, I want to know why we are to be lenient to the shortcomings of those who ought to be stronger, instead of weaker, than ourselves?"

She spoke impetuously. He was not quite prepared to answer her.

"Upon my word, that is one of those sort of questions that — that is rather difficult to discuss with you," he began.

She took up his words at once.

"We won't discuss it, please. I do want to say one thing, and then we will dismiss the subject. It is this. My only heroes are those who, having a high standard of right, strive to act up to it: not those, however gifted, who yield themselves slaves to every passing inclination of the moment. These men may have excuses made for their conduct, but the heroes before whom I am inclined to bow will never require such."

It was strange language from a girl; and the way in which she uttered it made a deep impression on Westbrook. He could not choose but take the application of those words as meant for himself. She was in another frame of mind from that which prompted her to palliate Westbrook's reported conduct when speaking to her brother; or rather the difference was, that she was speaking to the man himself — a man whom she liked, and whom she was conscious, if all was true, she could not respect — and not of him to another. She had spoken words which should show him there was a gulf fixed between them. Those words were the simple truth. However much she might like, and try to defend, a man whose character was assailed, she would never permit that liking to grow into a stronger feeling — indeed she felt that she could never give her whole heart to him unless he would stand up boldly, and disprove by his life the calumny of his assailants. If this man had real stuff in him, out of which better things than fell into a career of selfish indulgence might come, the words she had uttered might possibly rouse him.

And he understood her. That hour might be the turning point in his life. The blasé man of the world had never felt for any woman as he felt for this girl. He was accustomed to facile conquest, and the quiet fearlessness with which she defied him, while it irritated, had a charm for him, such as the flattering smiles of other women had never possessed. He was in danger, for the first time in his life, of forgetting himself in the object of his pursuit. A dim image of a possibly better life arose before him, and he felt that if he could, by any means, throw a blank across the gulf to which Olivia had pointed, he would burn his ships behind him, he would sacrifice everything which he had hitherto most prized; his independence, his popularity, his luxurious habits — everything.

A minute — but one minute, more, and he would have spoken. No matter what now: for that golden moment was lost, never to return again. Mrs. Pomfret, in a fluster of lace, came hurrying through the library door, and espying the fugitives, of whom she was in chase, exclaimed, “Oh! here you are! — Julian, they’re wanting you to dance. There’s Miss Mills just waiting for you to make up a set. — No, you mustn’t carry off Miss Marston, Julian, no! I’ve something particular to say to her. There, now, get up, and go and dance, and I’ll take your seat. Miss Marston, you won’t mind giving up the dance, will you?”

Julian Westbrook was a man with a strong will of his own, but he knew, by experience, that there were certain cases in which any one who ventured to combat with Aunt Pomfret was sure to be worsted. He saw that she was resolved to oust him from his position; and he yielded it, with a bad grace enough. It is unnecessary to say that he had not the remotest intention of condescending to dance with Miss Mills. He went into the door-way, and stared superciliously on at the quadrille, resolved to return to Olivia when it was over.

“My dear Miss Marston — my dear Olivia, if you will let me call you so, I have something very particular, very particular indeed, to say to you; and you must excuse me, my dear, if I’m rather abrupt, for it is a delicate matter to deal with, and one requiring a good deal more art than I possess, to clothe it in all its poetry and eloquence. But I am a plain-spoken woman, as you know, my dear, and not accustomed to varnish what I have to say. It’s about Lionel, poor dear boy! You must have observed, you cannot fail to have observed, how very dispirited he has been of late — how much he has avoided you, and how very strange and odd his manner has been?"

"Yes," replied Olivia, scarcely repressing a smile, "I have remarked that."

"Well, my dear Olivia, it's very flattering to you. He regards you as so infinitely above him in every way, that it is perfectly hopeless his even thinking of you. 'It were all one that he should love some bright particular star' — that sort of thing. I tried to argue him out of this state some time since, but in vain. Since then, his father and I have reason to fear that he has endeavoured to distract his thoughts by paying attention to a girl every way his inferior, and whom we never, never could receive as a daughter-in-law. You may imagine how very distressing this is to us, to see our boy's prospects in danger of being blighted, and his affections turned into an unworthy channel, my dear Olivia!"

Mrs. Pomfret paused, and Olivia saw she was expected to say something. She felt extremely uncomfortable; and yet the comicality of the idea seized her so strongly, that she could hardly forbear from laughing out. She commanded herself sufficiently at last, to reply with becoming gravity.

"What you say naturally surprises me a good deal, Mrs. Pomfret, as I have never seen the smallest indication on your son's part that he liked me. I am inclined to think, therefore, that you must be mistaken, and I trust that you may find reason to be reconciled to the choice he has made, in the course of time."

"Never!" exclaimed Mrs. Pomfret, vehemently. "Never, my dear! and it rests entirely with you to save us from this most terrible calamity. He hasn't the courage, he never would have the courage, to speak to you openly; but if you would only let him know, through me, that he needn't despair — if you would only tell him, through me, that if he gives up this horrid girl, you — you will think favourably of him, it would, it must, I know, prevent his going on with this abominable business. His father has always told him that he would do anything for him if he married, — as we wished, of course, — but he threatens naturally to cut him off if he disgraces us by marrying beneath him. And really if you could only tell how much there is in him, which only requires bringing out! A girl like yourself would be the saving of him. He has such a good heart, my dear Olivia, and you know we are all so fond of you, that I'm sure you couldn't fail to be happy" — and Mrs. Pomfret, in effusion, flung her arms round Olivia's neck.

She saw how it was, and she was sincerely sorry for the poor mother, though the absurdity of her manœuvres invested the thing with ridicule. Olivia had, of course, long seen the condition of Mrs. Pomfret's mind upon this subject — for it was, indeed, most transparent. What she now learnt was, that the heir of the Pomfrets, not content with remaining shy and ill at ease where his mother especially wished him to be talkative, had become dangerously talkative in some quarter where his mother would fain that he had remained silent. And now Olivia had to reply to what was, in fact, a proposal by proxy!

"My dear Mrs. Pomfret, I had better tell you frankly that I could not marry your son, even if he liked and wished to marry me, which I feel very certain he does not. Your flattering partiality for me has misled you. It is possible you might persuade your son into marrying me, but do you think that a marriage without love on either side, without a taste or a sentiment in common, can be happy? Be assured that it would only make us both miserable. Please say no more about it, dear Mrs. Pomfret. I feel your kindness in wishing to have me for a daughter-in-law, but it's quite impossible that this should be. Don't let us renew the subject."

"There is one thing I must say to you, Olivia," — and Mrs. Pomfret wiped the corners of her eyes with her worked handkerchief, — "there is one thing I must say very solemnly and seriously to you. If the cause of your refusing my son is the attention that you are receiving from Julian, you are doing a very foolish thing. Lionel mayn't be a brilliant, fascinating man of society, like his cousin, but I'm sure he never jilted a girl — never trifled with a girl's feelings in his life. He is only too soft, and too shy with women, and you must remember that the shiest men make the best husbands. I don't mind telling you that he will have some day a clear eighteen thousand a year, and that isn't to be picked up every day. As to Julian, I feel, of course, a certain hesitation in speaking about my husband's sister's son, who has always been so much with us, and who, indeed, is always welcome here, for he is a most agreeable creature to have in the house, but —"

"You need say no more, dear Mrs. Pomfret, than you have already done on this subject," interrupted Olivia, quickly, and with an unconscious tinge of sarcasm. "You are quite mistaken in imagining that your nephew has influenced in any way my refusal of the honour you have done me; consequently it can't concern me to hear what his past conduct has been, and I had rather not do so. Mr. Westbrook and I are never likely to be anything more than we now are to each other. I assure you there is no danger of my swelling the number of his victims — you need not be afraid for me."

She smiled as she spoke, and laid her hand gently upon Mrs. Pomfret's arm, with one of those feminine movements which convey a world of meaning in a very slight action. Westbrook came up at the same moment. The quadrille was over — would Miss Marston dance the next waltz with him? But Olivia was engaged; her partner even now approached to claim her hand. So Julian's opportunity was lost for that evening: and Mrs. Pomfret's edifice of maternal diplomacy crumbled into dust.

CHAPTER VIII.

A Crisis.

CIRCUMSTANCES ordained that Westbrook and Olivia should not meet again, after that evening, for a very long time to come. Great changes were to take place in the interval: yet so little did Julian foresee anything of the kind that, as he went to bed, he laid out plans for prosecuting the suit which he had only seriously commenced that night. He was not a man easily to be discouraged; he had not a doubt in his own capacity to overcome all Olivia's scruples and win her affection — if he continued in the same mind. But he was aware this winning would require time, and more perseverance than he had yet brought to bear on any similar task. Fate, however, it appeared, was against him.

Olivia was alarmed, at an early hour the following morning, by hearing that her father was very ill. She flew to his room, and found him speechless, his face drawn upon one side, his whole appearance in the space of a few hours having undergone a shocking change. He had parted from her the night before, an erect, hale, noble-looking old man; she found him helpless, broken-down, disfigured, his mind and his speech alike affected by the paralysis which had struck him. The best advice from London was telegraphed for, and for days, nay weeks, Mr. Marston's condition was held to be most critical. The doctors did not conceal from Olivia and her brother that a second such attack must in all probability prove fatal. At length, however, after a long interval of anxiety, during which the daughter watched by her father with unremitting care, there was an evident change for the better in the old man's state; the muscles of the face seemed gradually to relax, the tongue was loosed, and the left arm, which had hung helpless, he could now, in a measure, use. The powers of the mind and memory still remained affected; it was painful to see the efforts he made, with his recovered speech, to recal and to discuss past events: and the doctors held out no hope that in this respect he could be again as he had been, before this shock to his system. But even this much gained was a great deal — a great deal for which that loving daughter thanked God on her bended knees, after watching hour by hour, through the long warm days, and half the short warm nights of June, every varying shade upon the old man's face.

During these weeks she saw no one. Mrs. Pomfret called or sent daily; and it was a very congenial occupation for Aunt Clo (who was of no sort of use, otherwise, just now), to receive visits, to answer notes of inquiry, and to run about among the neighbours, disseminating her little crumbs of news. Julian Westbrook called several times: but as he found that Olivia was invisible, and as he had no particular fancy for a tête-à-tête with Miss Pringle, he contented himself with leaving his card.

Who shall say? perhaps it was fortunate that just at this time Olivia Marston's mind was too painfully occupied to give more than a passing thought to him, and that, whether at Caverton Park or at the Cedars, she and Julian were prevented from meeting. She was not in love; but it was not very far from the edge of the precipice which overhangs that fatal gulf that she had resolutely taken her stand, and, with averted eyes, had said, "no further." Julian was a clever fellow in his generation. If he could only have persuaded her that he was now altogether a changed man — a man whose principle nothing would shake, whose constancy no trial would affect — if he could only have led her, in short, by imperceptible degrees, to the very edge of that precipice, I will not undertake to say that the girl might not have turned giddy. But Fate, while frustrating Westbrook's plans, befriended Olivia. In more ways than one, it will be seen that Mr. Marston's illness proved in the end to be a blessing, rather than the calamity his children naturally considered it.

The Pomfrets' party had taken place in the first week in June. It was the beginning of the second week in July when Mrs. Pomfret called one morning early at the Cedars, and asked to see Miss Marston. Her father's condition had been mending now for the past week, and Olivia had already seen Mrs. Pomfret and her daughter more than once. She had been struck with Kate's looking ill, and with Mrs. Pomfret's appearing dispirited, and was, therefore, in some measure prepared for the announcement which the latter lady was come to make.

"You will be surprised to hear that we are all going abroad, my dear Miss Marston; and probably, I think, for some time. Kate's health has been giving me great anxiety of late, and the doctors recommend some German waters for her in the first instance, and probably, I think, a warm climate for the winter. Then Lionel, poor boy, sadly requires change of scene. He will accompany us; and I hope may recover his spirits, with new subjects of interest to occupy his mind. Probably my second boy, Harry, will join us in the winter, at Nice or somewhere. He expects to get leave from the West Indies, where he is quartered; so we shall be quite a large party, and I don't think we shall be in a hurry to return. I rather want Mr. Pomfret to sell Caverton."

The objects which the good lady had in view, in the speech above recorded, were various. In the first place, Kate's disappointment, owing to her mother's mistaken conduct, which had led her to fancy that Rupert Marston was in love with her — this was, of course, to be concealed, and a delicate organisation was to be substituted for a temporary derangement of the heart. Kate's common sense made her, at last, see that there was not a shadow of hope that Rupert would ever regard her as other than a pleasant partner — that he would ever hand her down to dinner in preference to any other girl he happened to be near. Slowly and reluctantly, Mrs. Pomfret's eyes had been opened to the same fact.

Another motive in this speech was the endeavour (to which she still clung) of making Miss Marston believe that Lionel had suffered much, though in strict silence, because of her; and that the loss of his "spirits" was owing to her unqualified rejection of his hand; the real truth being that Mr. Pomfret and his eldest son had had more than one animated conversation upon the subject of Miss Julia Roper, which had resulted in the elder gentleman's communicating to the lady's father his intention of cutting his son off with a shilling should he persist in marrying contrary to his parents' wishes. This extreme measure, instigated by Mrs. Pomfret, no doubt, was not without its effect. The wily tradesman, finding that he would have a helpless and ignorant son-in-law thrown upon his hands to support, besides the possibility of a large family, thought the honour of being allied to the house of Pomfret would be somewhat dearly bought, and prudently declined it. But in the fear of this desperate Leander swimming over the Hellespont which his parents had provided to obstruct his marriage, it was advisable to remove him from Hero's neighbourhood forthwith. This was really the chief reason for their resolving to go abroad for some months.

It was as well, however, that Olivia should feel all she was losing. We are said never fully to appreciate what we have possessed till this comes to pass. Therefore Mrs. Pomfret threw in those artistic touches about their lengthened wanderings abroad, and the uncertainty of their returning to Caverton. And then she waited for a reply.

"I think you are so right to go, if Kate's health is likely to be benefited, Mrs. Pomfret. I thought her looking very pale the other day; and you would enjoy a winter abroad. I envy any one going to the South, where my childhood was spent."

"I am sure I wish you could come with us."

"Thank you," said Olivia, with a smile; "my travelling is all over now. I did enough before I was eighteen to last my life. You will find me, in all probability, growing in the same place when you return, without having passed a single night away from the Cedars. I take it for granted that you will return to Caverton. I thought you were very fond of it, Mrs. Pomfret? and you have made it so comfortable — so very comfortable. Why should you leave it?"

"Well, there are a good many reasons," replied Mrs. Pomfret, clearing her throat of nothing, and ending with a dry cough; "a good many reasons; but I need only mention one — the lamentable want of society. I do not think it is doing our girls justice. Mary will be ready to come out next year, and I should like her to see something of the world. Now, really we have such a wretched set here, that we might as well be living — I don't know where."

"And where do you think of going?"

"London, perhaps — I don't know. Nothing is settled at present. Mr. Pomfret may perhaps take a larger place, more in the country, where we may have county society. You will write to me, my dear, won't you, when we are away?"

Olivia shook her head, smiling.

"No, Mrs. Pomfret, you mustn't trust to me. I have never had a correspondent in my life, and I have not the art of writing glib letters about nothing. If there is anything to tell you, I promise to let you hear; but my life is too uneventful, and I am too little accustomed to English composition, to undertake a regular correspondence with any one."

It was said laughingly, but Olivia did not relent, though Kate begged piteously for an occasional letter. She would promise no more than she had done at first — to write if she had anything to tell. Ten days later, the Pomfrets were actually gone. The great drawing-room at Caverton went into brown holland, and a padlock was put upon the lodge-gate.

Thus Westbrook's most obvious and natural means of communication with Olivia were cut off. The following week he rode down to the Cedars, and found the ladies — out. He tried yet once again, a few days later, before he left town; but with no better success. It was very provoking. He was going down to Goodwood, and then on to the moors, for the 12th of August; and after that, on a round of visits in Scotland; and he would not be in or near London again for three months at least. He consoled himself, however, with the reflection that the tenor of Olivia's life was very even: she would see few people, and she would go nowhere in the interval, to disturb the impression he was pretty confident he had made; and at the end of the three or four months he would return to find her just as he left her — only duller, and therefore more ready to prize his society. He had quite made up his mind that in the course of the ensuing winter he was to relinquish his independence, by inducing Olivia to become his wife. The short time that was left him, therefore, he resolved to enjoy his freedom, as best he might.

It was a dull November day when Julian Westbrook next mounted his hack at the Albany, and rode down to Fordingham. The fog hung about the river, and smothered everything that lay beyond the flat meadows, and the ghostlike skeletons of elms on either side of him, as he passed through the lane towards the Cedars. The last few leaves of autumn slid noiselessly through the damp, heavy air around. The colour of everything in the landscape seemed to be blotted out. It did not look like the same scene he had left, scarcely four months before. As he drew near the gate, his eyes fell upon a board, upon which was written, "To be let or sold. For particulars, apply to Mr. Rook, house agent, Maddox-street." He drew in his rein sharply, and sat there frowning at the board, as though he were unable to seize the meaning of those words; then opening the gate, he touched his horse with the spur, and rode on to the house at a smart canter.

The shutters were all closed. It was full five minutes before a woman in drab came to the door, and in answer to Westbrook's inquiries, told him that Mr. Marston's family had left the Cedars some two months ago. An agent had bought the place, and it was now again in the market. She did not know where Mr. Marston's family had gone. Had never heard. Perhaps Mr. Rook knew. All the furniture was sold, after the family left, by auction. Couldn't tell him no more: he had best go to Mr. Rook.

But when, on his return to London, the discomfited Julian applied to Mr. Rook, the latter individual professed himself as ignorant of the movements of the family as the woman had done. All his dealings were with Mr. Rupert Marston, at Mr. Claxton's house of business, in the City. Now, Julian was perfectly conscious of Rupert's dislike to him; and he returned it. He felt an extreme repugnance to applying to young Marston for information about his sister: and, after some deliberation, he came to the conclusion that, if the Pomfrets could not help him, he must leave it to time and chance to obtain this information. He never doubted but that, somehow or other, it would turn up before long.

CHAPTER IX.

Changed Fortunes.

It was the evening of the 12th August — of the day that Westbrook was beginning his campaign among the moors. The day had been one of those few of real summer which we enjoy in England; its close was clear and golden, promising a glorious morrow. The library window stood open, and through it the sweet breath of jasmine and honey-suckle was borne from the clusters that hung from the trellis around. In the centre of the lawn Olivia had lately placed a small white marble basin, round which her doves settled in relays, drinking and pluming themselves, and then fluttering back to their dove-cote in the elm hard by, while others of their family replaced them. Beyond, and in strong contrast to the white marble, the green-black cedars sent their long shadows at this hour eastward over the close-shaven lawn; while, further off again, the brown barges and pleasure-boats glided by upon the sunset river, in which every reed and dock-leaf upon the opposite bank was reflected, as in a golden mirror. In those rich meadow lands yonder, which looked almost metallicly green by this light, cattle were feeding lazily to their hearts' content, while one or two had come down to the water to drink, and were standing in it knee-deep, whisking the flies off with their tails, and raising their black dripping muzzles ever and anon with an air of quiet satisfaction.

It was a picture eminently characteristic of England — of its middle-class respectability and plenty. The quiet suburban villa, with everything for comfort and nothing for ostentation; that marvellous carpet of green velvet, so unlike anything that is known by the name of grass on the Continent; the lush, dank pastures opposite, where the heavy-uddered cattle were feeding in sleek contentment, were suggestive elements in a scene, not beautiful, perhaps, but pleasant in the sense that it conveyed to the mind abundance, security, and peace.

Mr. Marston's chair was wheeled near the window. He sat there dozing; but woke from time to time to observe that it was very dark, and to elicit the stereotyped rejoinder from his daughter; after which he relapsed into his former state again, quite satisfied. Olivia was alone with her father, as indeed she generally was now. Since his illness she liked less than ever to leave him. Aunt Clo, finding it dull, betook herself constantly to one or other of the neighbours to tea, whence she returned at ten o'clock in a black silk hood and galoches, attended by her maid. Rupert often came home very late now — sometimes not at all. An early dinner had therefore been established, with a tea-supper at nine, when, if Rupert was at home, he dined; but the greater part of those long summer evenings Olivia and her father were alone.

She was doing nothing: she was building some Spanish castle, I believe; for her eyes had a dreamy, abstracted look, and her hands lay listless over the piece of tapestry before her, whose brilliant colours contrasted with the black oak chair and dim figure of the old man.

On a small table stood a basket of nectarines, an old silver claret-jug, and some glasses. The last rays of the sunset, stealing slantwise into the room, lit the rosy-cheeked fruit and silver flagon, and fell upon the snow-white hair and calm sleeping majesty of the old man. And then the shades of twilight gradually swallowed them up, and everything in the room grew dim and indistinct.

I have dwelt thus long on that home picture, the taste and luxury of its details, and the tranquillity that reigned there, because this was the last evening in Olivia's life she was destined to pass in that house, under the same conditions of peace and security. A great change was at hand. The moment was come when the even routine of her life was to be broken in upon; when her labour of filial love, while increased twofold, must yet make room for busy thought and action in other fields. That golden summer's evening she often looked back upon, as dividing two distinct portions of her life from each other.

It was half-past eight; Mr. Marston still dozed: it was too dark to read or work without lights, and Olivia was loth to ring for them. She sat there, watching the shadows deepening on the river, the purple veil drooping lower and lower over the heavens, the flat green meadows turning to dusky grey, when a large bat flitted past the window, almost close to her face. She instinctively drew back with a shudder, and found Rupert standing beside her. He had come in so noiselessly — contrary to his usual habit — that Olivia had not heard him. He raised his finger to his lips, and pointed to his father.

"Come into the next room," he said, in a hoarse whisper; "I have something to say to you."

His sister rose, and followed him without a word. There was that in her brother's manner which told her it was no ordinary communication she was about to hear.

"Olive, you must prepare yourself for a piece of bad news."

She said nothing, but sat down on a chair near at hand; a sudden weakness came over her, which made her distrust her own strength. He took her hand in both of his; he felt that it turned icy cold, and he waited a moment or two before he spoke again.

"Olive, a great misfortune has befallen our father."

"Go on; only tell me the worst at once."

"He is ruined. What I feared has come to pass. Lozados is bankrupt."

She started up, and threw herself into his arms.

"Oh, Rupert, our poor father!"

It was all she said. She lay there quite motionless for several minutes, and her brother had the tact to remain silent also. He knew her deep strong nature too well to attempt to soften this blow. It was a heavy one, but she would rise up from it; for it was not of a kind to impair energy such as Rupert knew his sister possessed. Her first words, her only thoughts, were for her father. After an interval she whispered,

"How can we hide this from him, Rupert? It would kill him just now to be told this."

"My darling, sooner or later he must know it. I leave it to you to break it to him when and how you will. You know I wouldn't have grieved you with the burden of this heavy anxiety if it were possible to avert its consequences in any way — if there were the remotest chance of our being able to continue living here, surrounded by comfort and luxury. But there is not. Everything must be sold — servants — horses — every thing given up. My father will have very little besides what the sale of the house and furniture fetches. There is a small sum that belonged to our mother, which is safe in the English funds, and that is all that is left of his large fortune. It is a terrible wreck, Olive — a terrible wreck! If he would only have listened to me instead of——"

"Dear Rupert, don't think of reproaching him now, even in thought; only let us try and shield him from the weight of this dreadful blow, which he will feel far, far more than you or I can. It is nothing to us comparatively, who are young and strong; but think of him in his old age, blind and helpless, brooding over the past with fruitless regret — O, Rupert, what would I give to spare him this!"

"God knows, Olive, so would I — and I have thought of little else since early this morning, when the extent of the calamity was made known to me. One thing I can't be sufficiently thankful for — that my father gave up the conduct of all his affairs into my hands when he became so ill. It renders it much easier for me to do all that it is absolutely necessary should be done, at once — and you can take your own time, Olive, in breaking it to him. But he must be prepared for the change.”

“When must it come?” she asked, in a low voice. “When must we leave the house?”

“Not for two or three weeks. I could sell it to-morrow, but hope to do so to more advantage by putting it up to auction, and I shall have it advertised. You must give the servants warning, however. I am afraid even Fritz must go. We must break up the establishment as soon as possible, for every day is a serious drain on our income. My salary, you know, is small. We shall not make up altogether more than 300*l.* a year. The change in all our ways, Olive, must be a complete one. We must come into London, I fear; for even omnibuses and rails run away with a great deal out of such an income.”

“And Aunt Clo? What will she do? It has been very trying sometimes, Rupert, her being with us even here; how much worse will it be in our poverty, in a small lodging?”

“Rats desert a falling house. You will see that Aunt Clo shows no desire to follow us into obscurity, Olive. You must be prepared to lose most of your friends, I am afraid, when your ways and theirs are split wide asunder.”

“If Aunt Clo leaves us I shall be too thankful, Rupert; and as to friends, the Pomfrets are the only neighbours whom I can call so. They are gone, and with the rest I have no wish to keep up any communication. Oh! if I could only do something, Rupert, to get money — something to help to support myself, and not to be a burden to you! But I feel so helpless! I have no accomplishments; I am not even a good worker; and he, poor darling, will require my attention now more than ever. I couldn't leave him, or else I might perhaps go——”

“Olive, whatever befalls us, as long as I can work, remember your place is by my father's side, where you will find enough to do, my poor child, in the daily drudgery of life, deprived of all the comforts to which you have been accustomed. Don't think about work: it will come to you in some form. In adversity a woman is often more helpful in other ways than in stitching.”

Olivia sat down and buried her face in her hands.

“Poor father — how will he ever bear this? I dread it, Rupert. I dread telling him more — far more than the poverty itself. God help him to bear it!”

“So He will, through you, Olive, and I hope a little through me. Henceforward we must be more closely united than ever, my sister. We are alone against all the world, and we will face it courageously.”

The next morning, after a sleepless night, Olivia prepared to tell her aunt of the great change in their fortunes. Miss Pringle was at first incredulous as to the extent of the ruin which had overtaken her brother-in-law; then she became loud in her reproaches at the imprudence which had brought about this result; and then at last she was silent. What her decision would be, whether or no she would elect to remain with her impoverished relations, was yet to be seen. But Olivia's mind was now wholly occupied with a far greater anxiety. That sleepless night had been productive of one definite resolve. As long, and as far as possible, she determined to conceal from her father the condition of his affairs. She hardly dared hope to do so permanently. But if she could gradually accustom his mind to the great change which must take place in their manner of life, the danger of a sudden shock in his present condition would be averted.

The doves were cooing in the sunshine; the fountain was babbling its tale of pleasantness and peace: never had her home looked so charming to Olivia as it did that morning, when she knew how soon now it must all pass into the hands of strangers. She drew her chair to the old place at her father's side, and she steadied her voice to read the Times, as usual, from beginning to end. But the eye and the voice alone read: the mind was other where. When she had done, she put down the paper, and said, with as unconcerned a voice and manner as she could command,

"Father, should you mind very much leaving this place and going into London? Rupert and I have been talking over it. The distance is very inconvenient for him, and for me, too. We think it would be much better if we were to change houses. Perhaps a smaller house would do for us in London, you know."

"Change? Leave this house? What do you mean, Olivia? What's this — eh?"

"You wouldn't mind it for Rupert's sake, father, would you?"

"What are you talking about, child? I'm too old — too old to change. Wait till I'm under ground. It won't be long. Rupert can go to London if he likes, but you and I'll remain here."

There was something of his old decision — something even of sharpness in the way he spoke. Olivia hesitated a moment before she said,

"To be parted from Rupert would be a great sorrow to us both, father. He is our morning and evening star. We should not be able to get on at all, I think, if he were to go and live away from us in London."

A shade passed over the blind man's face: he sighed.

"Perhaps you are tired of your quiet life here, Olive?"

She felt the blood rush into her face: she was glad for once that her father could not see.

"Not tired of its quiet, father — oh, no! But this is, perhaps, damp — damp and foggy, so near the river, and surrounded by trees. London, no doubt, would be healthier — better for us in all ways."

"You are not feeling ill, are you?" he said, hastily.

"No, father."

"It can't be much darker in London than here — that's one thing," he muttered.

"And the houses are much warmer," observed his daughter. "You will not have all the draughts you have here. Rupert will be home, too, a whole hour earlier, and leave us a whole hour later than he does now. That will be a great thing, father, won't it?"

"But I have a long lease of the house, Olive, and I won't part with it at a loss. No, no; I'd rather remain where I am."

He settled himself back in his chair, as though he had relapsed into his former condition of mind, and were resolved to abide in it.

"It seems," said Olivia, quietly, "that the Cedars may be parted with to great advantage. At least, so Rupert says."

Mr. Marston turned sharply towards his daughter, but he said nothing. The mine, however, was sprung. Little by little, day after day, the work of overcoming his natural repugnance to the idea of any change was carried further. Olivia voluntarily accepted the position forced on her: to please Rupert and herself, their father was asked to make this great sacrifice of his wishes and personal comfort. It was an ungracious office, this apparently selfish pleading; and it moved Olivia to tears, seeing how the blind man dreaded all that was strange and unknown, to find him, in his undemonstrative love for his children, yielding to her gentle persistence. But, having once brought his mind over the bar of rough waters, the fine old man let himself drift in silence whithersoever his children steered. The weakening of all his faculties tended to this result, no doubt. And the decision which Miss Pringle arrived at in the course of that week helped greatly, I believe, to reconcile him to the proposed change.

"My dear, as to your keeping all this a secret from your papa, it is perfect nonsense, you know. You can't keep your altered circumstances from him — how can you? Living in a poky lodging, with a maid-of-all-work to cook your dinner, my dear, how is it to be done? And that reminds me to tell you what I was going to say about myself. My health, as you know, is very delicate; I'm obliged to take great care of myself; and really I do feel as if I should be in your way, my dear, in a lodging, and living in the very different way you must now. And in a confined part of the town, too. No! much as I shall regret leaving you, my love, I feel it would not be right to indulge in the selfish wish to remain with you, though I shall, of course, see you very constantly, and I hope to be able to take you out by-and-by, when your affairs are a little set to rights. I dare say they won't turn out as bad, after all, as you expect."

Olivia smiled — a little sadly, perhaps. Had she been cynically disposed, she might have indulged her inclination at the expense of poor human nature. As it was, she only assured her aunt (with entire sincerity) that she cordially approved of her resolution; and Olivia did not think it necessary to add that Miss Pringle's prospect of taking her "out" offered no temptation to her niece, and would certainly not be realised in their present altered circumstances.

A few days later the Cedars was sold by private contract to Mr. Rook, the auctioneer; and before the month was out a sale took place of nearly all the furniture, books, and pictures. Of furniture, enough was saved to fill the small apartment Rupert had taken in London; of books, all his father's and most of his sister's favourite authors were rescued; of pictures, since the blind man could sustain no sense of loss through these, none were spared. All with which he could by possibility come into contact — the silver and the fine damask for his own use at table, the choice old wine for his own drinking — were carefully put aside from the general wreck; and for the same reason, Olivia's piano. Through those senses left to him, the old and enfeebled man should never learn, if possible, the ruin which had overtaken all that he loved on earth.

CHAPTER X.

The New Home.

THE miserable spectacle, so often described, of a crowd of hook-nosed, dirty-looking men elbowing each other round a table, while almost as great a crowd of curious idlers are strolling through the rooms which they have never seen before, and while the appraiser's voice, and the sound of the hammer, and the buzz of indifferent conversation, rouse other echoes from those the quiet house has hitherto known — this miserable spectacle the Cedars witnessed at the end of September. Three days before that, Mr. Marston and his family moved into the apartments which were to be their home henceforward.

There is a street leading out of the Strand — no matter its name — at the end of which a row of handsome, old-fashioned houses faces the river. Those who know this part of London will at once recognise the spot; for the information of others, it is only necessary to say that, quietly hid away from the turmoil which reigns only a stone's throw from it, such a row of buildings does exist — their architect, probably, some disciple of Inigo Jones, their original occupants, possibly, well-to-do merchants in the beginning of the last century. The broad strip of pavement which runs in front of them has no flâneurs; the dilapidated iron rails which divide the street, on the other side, from the wharves below, give an interrupted view beyond of the penny steamers panting every minute up and down the river, and of the gas-works on the opposite bank, and of the great bridges to right and left, with the House of Parliament on one flank, and the Tower, with St. Paul's, on the other. This is better than looking on a brick wall pierced with holes, more especially when those holes have human eyes in them to watch all that their neighbours do. But Fashion is justified of her children, and she wanders no longer by the banks of our great river. Time was, no doubt, when powdered lacqueys hung about the lintels of these broad pilastered doors, through which sedan-chairs passed gaily in and out of nights, and their owners, in brocaded dressing-gowns, sipped chocolate at those windows that look upon the river; and no superannuated placards (driven from the great thoroughfares) were hung in those days against the railings, nor did colonies of broken glass and orange-peel find refuge in their vicinity. Now, business only tempts the pedestrian to turn out of the Strand down the narrow street that leads to this cul-de-sac; coach-wheels rarely rumble over the ill-fitting stones, which have not been renewed for Heaven knows how long; it is a stitch dropped in the great network of busy London life.

In this row of houses Rupert had found apartments, and it will be at once apparent how many advantages the situation possessed for them all. In the heart of London, within a quarter of an hour's walk of Rupert's house of business, Mr. Marston would find all the sunshine that our City ever enjoys, with a constant current of that fresh river-air of which he was so fond.

On that long strip of pavement he could take his quarter-deck walk, with almost as little fear of interruption as on the terrace of his old home. It was easy for the blind man to learn the very confined map to which his daily evolutions would be circumscribed. The rooms he lived in were upon the ground-floor: the sitting-room to the front, the bedroom and a very small parlour to the back. There were doors of communication between each, and a single stone step led him out, with Fritz's arm, upon the broad sunny pavement.

Rupert and Olivia were upon the second floor. It was the one drawback to this apartment — and everything must have one drawback at least — that the intervening floor was occupied. Mrs. Flaherty, the landlady, assured Olivia that it was impossible she or her father could sustain any discomfort on this score, since "the party" occupying the enviable position of first-floor lodger never slept there, and was the quietest gentleman that ever stepped, during the few hours he passed there daily. Not that he came there by any means every day, added Mrs. Flaherty (thereby justifying her nationality); on the contrary, a whole week would go by, sometimes, without his appearing. In short, if the first floor was to be let, it was clearly impossible for the tenant to be more innocuous, and in every way desirable. Still, it was a drawback that two flights of stairs should separate Olivia's room from her father's. Since his alarming illness, however, Fritz had always slept in his master's room, so that Rupert and his sister had no uneasiness in being thus far from their father at night.

Fritz was the only servant the Marstons kept. Mrs. Flaherty and her cook did the housework between them, and the helpful old German generally lent his hand in the kitchen in preparing some dish for his master's special consumption. It was well that Rupert had not, like most young men in the present day, pampered his appetite to that degree of fastidiousness which leads an ill-dressed dinner to be regarded as one of the most serious punishments this life can award. The mutton at first was very often underdone, and had to be sent down in slices and broiled; and the memory of those leaden crusts under which a beefsteak was periodically buried—is it not as a nightmare unto them even now? For themselves, Rupert and Olivia bore their change of cuisine, as they had supported heavier trials, with equanimity. For their father, they were naturally anxious that this change should not be perceptible. With Fritz's help, and the doctrines of an old cookery-book of her mother's, which Olivia now studied sedulously, she succeeded in this with complete success. She went down into the kitchen herself; she helped the little maid to the measurement and proper mixing of ingredients. It was a sight to see her with knit brows expounding from the solemn text of Mrs. Glasse, in the kitchen of that London lodging-house. And she was rewarded as she deserved.

Mrs. Flaherty was not "a character." She was a common-place, kind-hearted old Irishwoman; rather shrewd, and very talkative, but generally inexact in all her statements; a devout Roman Catholic, credulous as a child, and slatternly in appearance. She was the widow of an excise officer, and had seen "better days." But those were long ago. She had kept lodgings in London for the last five-and-twenty years: and there was, in consequence, a certain flavour of cockneydom stirred into this Hibernian compound. She occupied a room on the same floor as Olivia and her brother, but to the back. The floor above was at present unlet; and, though corresponding to what are generally garrets, it consisted of four comfortable and airy rooms. This, with the kitchen and Mrs. Flaherty's adjoining demesne, formed the whole house.

Rupert took his sister over their new home before he finally agreed to Mrs. Flaherty's offer; and as Olivia saw at once all the advantages it possessed for her father, the bargain was closed then and there. Little by little, Mr. Marston's mind was reconciled to the idea of living in London — for his children's sakes. They had found a house for him by the river-side — a sunny house and quiet. His rooms were on the ground floor; his two old friends would often come in here and see him; the bustle and business of London was near at hand for his children — for Rupert more especially. If he thought with regret, then or afterwards, of the soft velvet lawn on which he used to walk in summer-time, of the cawing of the rooks and cooing of the doves, and the many peaceful country sounds which had cheered the great solitude of blindness, he hid the feeling away carefully out of his children's sight. Was the self-sacrifice and devotion all on one side? Not so.

The room into which they led him that still September afternoon, when Mr. Marston took his leave of the Cedars, had been made as like the library of their old home as furniture could make it. Had the eyes of the blind man been opened to look around him as he entered, he would not have learnt the change of fortune that had befallen him from the aspect of the room. There, along the side of the pale-green wall, with its rich cornice of white stucco, and over against the carved marble mantelpiece (both telling of the house's original estate), stood one of the walnut bookshelves saved from the sale. The Turkey carpet, the easy-chairs, Olivia's piano and her Davenport, a jardinière full of such plants as she thought would best stand the London air, and a Venetian leather screen, to shield from the draught of the open door the corner into which Mr. Marston's chair was drawn — these were household gods from the old temple transported to the new. The small parlour adjoining was equally comfortable; and into Mr. Marston's bedroom most of the old furniture had been moved, and arranged, as nearly as possible, in the way to which he was used. For Olivia's and Rupert's rooms, on the other hand, nothing but what was essential and of the simplest kind had been kept back. Upon the second floor their father would assuredly never set his foot.

Mr. Marston knew very little of London. Half a lifetime ago he had spent a few months there occasionally; but it had never been his home, and of its geography he was quite ignorant.

"Is the house well situated?" he had asked.

"Nothing can be better," was his daughter's reply. "Airy and sunny; not far from Northumberland House and Whitehall, which, as you remember, father, is a line of palaces. We have the river in front of us, too."

"And what size is the house — eh?"

"Oh, large; quite as large as we want — larger, indeed."

"And the stabling? I hope Rupert has been particular about there being good stabling?"

"There is stabling close at hand. Rupert will see to all that, father. You may make your mind quite easy."

"And the rent? He hasn't told me anything about that yet, Olive. He must tell me; though I haven't the head for accounts I had, still I must know — do you hear? I can't afford to pay an exorbitant rent — remember that."

"No, dear father; but you can quite trust Rupert. You know you have given up everything into his hands, and he is so careful, you could not manage better yourself."

"Ah, well, I don't know about that; the boy hasn't any experience, and women don't understand anything about money matters, Olive."

"The house will cost you a great deal less than this, father," she replied, rather nervously.

"Um! Well, Rupert must explain to me about it. I can't be running into debt. Moving is a great expense. 'Take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves.' Rupert must explain everything to me."

But the weakened state of Mr. Marston's mind, his incapacity of fixing it upon any one subject for long together, rendered it comparatively easy to turn his attention from such explanations. And when he was once established in his new home — when he had got to know the relative position of doors and windows, and the arrangement of chairs and tables — when he had once slid into that new groove of existence which, as far as he was concerned, at least, so closely re-seemed the old one, he contentedly accepted the change without question, or disquietude of any kind. Truly the blow had been dealt in mercy which rendered it possible to conceal the truth from the once shrewd and keenly sensitive old man.

There was a small incident — a very small one — which happened a few days after they had entered their new home; it was this.

The afternoon was warm for the time of year: Mr. Marston had taken his walk, and now sat by the open window. Olivia took a volume of Travels from the bookcase to read to her father, and drew her chair, as usual, close to his. As she did so, the folds of her coarse stuff dress touched his hand. He took it up between his finger and thumb, and said, after a minute's pause —

"Why don't you wear something thinner such a warm day, child?"

"This is better for London; things get so dirty here, and washing is expensive."

"Hem! it seems to me like sackcloth. I used to like to hear the rustle of your silk gown."

"I've only one, which I keep for grand occasions." She did not say that all the others were sold, as useless to her now.

"When did I sign a cheque?" he asked, suddenly; "it seems a long time."

"We've enough money in the house to go on with, father."

"Well, go and buy yourself a gown. 'And ye shall walk in silk attire,'" he quavered out. "Why, what must your aunt have said when she saw you in that sackcloth — eh? I'll be bound she found it remind her, somehow or other, of one of her old conquests."

Olivia laughed. "It is no use wearing smart dresses with only the smoky sparrows to see one. There is no one in town now, father. Even Aunt Clo, you know, is going to Margate. I don't want another gown now."

"Hem! I'm afraid — that is, I suppose she's not going to stay there, is she?"

"No; she's going to take a small house in Bayswater."

"Ah! that's where the fire was, Fritz was reading to me about. Terrible! I should like to send the poor souls something — a mother and five children — ta — ta! Let the parson have five pounds for them, child, without any name, will you? and then there's an end of that."

This was one of the trials she was so often subject to, when she had to evade the old man's charitable injunctions, which she was quite unable to obey, and then to satisfy him on the subject as best she might. Fortunately, his memory often failed him now; his old acuteness only returned by fits and starts.

One evening he was asleep when Rupert entered.

"What news from the City?" asked Mr. Marston, starting up with sudden alacrity. "What is the state of the funds — eh?"

"Consols firm at 93, father," said Rupert, with a half smile, half sigh.

"And no more absurd reports about Lozados — eh, Rupert? You're not going to try and frighten me again about him, I suppose, are you?"

"No, I am never going to try and frighten you again about him, father."

He turned to his sister after a moment's pause and said:

"Whose death do you think I have just seen in the paper? — Lionel Pomfret's."

"Good heavens, how sudden! Where was it?"

"At Ems, on the 5th — a fortnight ago. I'm not surprised; he always looked an unhealthy fellow."

"I am very sorry for his poor mother."

"Have you ever written to them yet, Olive?"

"No; but I will do so now, of course."

"You promised to let them hear in case you had anything to tell them — don't you remember? They were so kind to you, that you've no right to keep them in ignorance of all that has befallen us, and of our present residence. It's quite different with all our other neighbours at Fordingham. I have made it generally understood that, as circumstances now oblige us to live in strict retirement, you didn't wish to receive visits in London. I have therefore declined giving our address to the numerous well meant applications that have been made to me at Mr. Claxton's, to learn where you were to be found."

"That is just what I wished. It would bore me to death, Rupert, to have to receive the condolences of the Blighs and the Wellses, and all the tribes of Fordingham; and my time is even more occupied than it used to be. Indeed, that is the reason I have not yet written to Mrs. Pomfret. I fully meant to do so. I will write to-morrow. Shall I give any message from you?"

"Oh, remember me to them, and say I'm very sorry — something of that sort, you know; and mind you inquire particularly how my little friend the school-girl is. What is her name? Mary, ain't it? Nice little thing."

"Yes. By-the-bye, Aunt Clo was here to-day. She came in a new green bonnet, and brought me a present. What do you think it was? An old blonde dress, in which she used to dance at the Cheltenham Assembly Rooms fifty years ago, I should think. She kindly proposed to take me to Jullien's Promenade Concerts also."

The brother and sister laughed together; and Rupert, leaning over to his father, said:

"Miss Pringle sat with you some time, I hear, to-day? I hope she made herself agreeable, and that you enjoyed her visit."

"Hem! very good of her to come. She's gone though, I hope, ain't she? She's not going to stay? Ah! gone to Margate — that's all right."

And on having his doubts reassured, Mr. Marston gave a sigh of satisfaction.

CHAPTER XI.

The Lodger on the First Floor.

It will be seen that the chances of Julian Westbrook's discovering Olivia's present residence were remote. Had he been a genuine hero of romance, he would, no doubt, have caused Rupert to be followed from Mr. Claxton's office some afternoon, and traced to his sister's home; and he would then have dogged the young lady's steps pertinaciously till he accidentally came across her path. As it was, he did nothing of the sort. He made inquiries of every one whom he thought in the least likely to possess the information he sought; and he cursed Fortune for denying it to him. But Fortune treated him as she generally does those who behave so uncivilly to her — with contempt. During the long winter months that followed — when Julian, from some cause or other, was detained in town, the Pomfrets being abroad, and most of his intimate friends in the country — the idle man of pleasure would have found a source of permanent interest in the cultivation of that passion which had attained to a certain growth during the past summer. For some time his vexation took a moody, misanthropic turn. He was angry with himself for having lost his opportunity; he was cross with the world (which was hunting in Leicestershire just then, and Julian didn't hunt); he was, above all, irritated against the whole of the fair sex collectively. He thought, or tried to think, that he had good reason to complain on this head — not an uncommon condition of mind with men like Julian. He was an ill-used man. He repeated this to himself every drizzly December afternoon that he rode down to Fordingham (having nothing in the world to do in London), and cultivated sentiment by letting his hack wander, at foot's pace, among the lanes surrounding the Cedars.

It is now time that I should speak of Mrs. Flaherty's first-floor lodger, whose eccentric tenure of his apartment excited Olivia's curiosity, it must be confessed, after she had once seen him. This was not until she had been for several weeks in her new home, during which time "the first floor" came most mornings, vanishing again towards dusk, and remaining silent and invisible, in his rooms during the intervening hours. No bell ever rang from the first floor; no visitor was ever known to come there. The lodger carried away the key in his pocket every evening, and Mrs. Flaherty's desecrating brooms and dusters were only admitted at certain long intervals of time, the lodger not choosing to have his rooms "set to rights" during his absence. All this was a subject of profound indifference to Miss Marston, and she turned a deaf ear when Mrs. Flaherty began dilating upon the strange conduct of her "first floor," combined with his punctuality of payment, and his princely liberality in small matters. It was a subject of profound indifference to Olivia, I repeat, until she had seen this Mr. Thompson — for such was the unromantic name he bore — and then she began to feel a curiosity to hear something about him.

It was late in the afternoon — about the hour that Rupert generally returned — and Olivia, having left her father asleep, was going up to her own room for a few minutes, when, as she closed the sitting-room door softly behind her, she saw the figure of a man descending the stairs. She was so unaccustomed to see any man but her brother about the house, that she had begun to forget the possibility of meeting a stranger upon that common territory, the staircase.

"Rupert," she said, as she advanced towards the figure, which was now within a few steps of the bottom one, "don't disturb my father; he is asleep. I didn't know you were come in."

She started back as she finished speaking, for the person who now stood close to her was a stranger.

Though dusk, it was still possible to distinguish his features as he raised his hat and bowed. He was not a very young man; a little bald about the temples; somewhat above the middle height; and of a square and powerful build. The lines of the face were full of mastery. The broad, massive brow; the aquiline nose; the large mouth, clasped so firmly under the short auburn moustache; the square, somewhat protruding chin, softened by its short beard, indicated a character of no common force. The expression of the eyes was sad, almost stern. But of all this Olivia saw nothing — nothing but that a middle-aged man, with a fine head, and the manners of a perfect gentleman, stood for an instant before her. His clothes looked rather shabby; he carried an oblong parcel under his arm; yet the man was unmistakably a gentleman. In the glance she had of his head, it reminded her of a portrait in the Pitti Palace which she had often thought about.

He had the good taste not to notice her mistake otherwise than by that silent bow. He passed on; and before Olivia had recovered from her surprise, he was gone.

When Mrs. Flaherty came up, ten minutes afterwards, to close Miss Marston's shutters, she found her leaning out of window, over the quickly darkening river.

"I suppose it was Mr. Thompson I met on the stairs just now — a tall man, dressed in black?"

"Sure and that'll be Mr. Thompson himself, miss. For what 'd I be havin' other gintlemin in the house for, save and except your brother, miss, and me a lone woman, as has always kep' me house respectable?"

And no one in the Row as can say a word agin me, though that Mrs. Burke is as spiteful as ever she can be, and ——”

“Yes, I know, Mrs. Flaherty; but I wanted to ask you about Mr. Thompson. Do you know anything about him? How long has he had these lodgings?”

“Somethin’ betther nor three months, miss. And a noble charakter he is, is Mr. Thompson, that niver looks at both sides of a half-crown. But as to where he come from, and where he go to, and why he be so shockin’ melancholy, — faith! it’s not Biddy Flaherty that gossips and pries into her lodgers’ sacrets, miss, nor tells all down the Row what ye have for dinner, nor how much linen goes to the wash in the week, as some does. Lord bless y’r sowl, miss, if I’d ha’ chose it, I could ha’ found out, in coorse, where he come from; but he pays me me rint reg’lar, and is a princely-hearted gintleman — and the rist is no consarn of mine. Is it now, miss?”

“Of course not, Mrs. Flaherty. You cannot be sufficiently thankful that you have such a model lodger. I suppose you don’t know, then, what it is makes him come here during the day and go away at night?”

“I think,” said Mrs. Flaherty, with knit brows, as though she were solving some difficult problem, “that he must be a scholard, or a doctor, or somethin’. He’s a deal o’ books about — which gits covered with dust afore iver he’ll let me in to clane them — and papers with feet and hands and bowns; and sich a shockin’ thing as I come upon last time I was there — it gave me quite a turn! — a man’s bawdy, with all the flish and sinews drawed as nat’ral as life, and no skin on it! And thin he has a great boord covered over whiniver I comes in — somethin' medical, for sure — and a tin box of instruments, as I take it, which he tould me niver to touch. I wouldn't, bless me sowl, for all the world, for fear o' poison!"

"And there is a strong smell of turpentine — is there not?" asked Olivia.

"That's thrue for you, miss, sure enough. And how could ye be guessin' that, now?"

"Your lodger is an artist — a painter, Mrs. Flaherty. I see it all. He comes here to paint, for the sake of much purer and clearer light than he can have in the dingy part of London he probably inhabits."

This view of the case did not recommend itself very strongly to Mrs. Flaherty. She seemed to apprehend that the dignity of her "first floor" must suffer from the supposition that he painted "pictures to sell" — "which ain't in no ways likely," she added, with some show of reason, "for no one iver comes here, and he niver takes nothin' away — so how can he sell pictures, miss? which is as free with his money as can be! No, faith! me belief is that he's a scholard," concluded Mrs. Flaherty, knitting her brows once more; and this reconciled every difficulty in the good woman's mind.

Olivia did not pursue the discussion further. She had no stronger argument than she had used to oppose to Mrs. Flaherty's plausible one, even had she felt disposed to continue this guesswork; and she did not. She went down-stairs to her father, knowing that Mrs. Flaherty would continue gossiping there for an hour, if she gave her the opportunity.

In the course of the evening she told Rupert of her encounter with the stranger, and her mistake.

"The fellow is a gentleman," said her brother, "or he would have tried to scrape an acquaintance with you on the strength of your speaking to him. By the bye ——"

He stopped short; then, after a second or two, continued —

"I hate secrets, Olive, and now more than ever we will have none from each other, if possible. I met Westbrook in Charing-cross to-day."

His sister was trying to do a piece of plain work. She did not look up, or leave off, but there occurred one or two uneven stitches just then.

"I was going to pass him, but he stopped me, and inquired about you and my father, and where you lived, and whether he mightn't come and see you, and ended by doing me the great honour to beg me to come and see him. I assure you I was nearly overpowered; however, I managed to preserve my presence of mind, and I replied, with tolerable coolness, that for certain family reasons you were living in strict retirement just now, and saw no one. For myself, my business habits prevented my paying visits. He looked annoyed, and said he couldn't believe that you would refuse to see him if you knew that an old friend was desirous of making his inquiries after you in person."

"I always told you, Rupert," she said, very quietly, "that he was not as worldly as you thought — that he had more heart. The change in our worldly position would not influence him. But it is much better that he should not come here. You are quite right."

"If I disliked his coming to the Cedars, Olive, of course I should dislike it doubly here. There is every reason against it. Among others, one I have said nothing to you about as yet — for nothing was settled. But this very day, curiously enough, Mr. Claxton has spoken again of the probability of his wishing to send me to the West Indies for two or three months, to visit certain property there, and settle some disputes which it is difficult to do at home. His placing this trust in me is very complimentary, and, as such, I can hardly refuse it; for it will raise my position in the house, and my salary, very considerably. The drawback, of course, Olive, is leaving you and my father here; but it will not be for long — three or four months at most, I believe.”

“You mustn’t let any thought of us trouble you,” said his sister, laying her hand upon his arm; “we shall do very well during your absence, and I am delighted that Mr. Claxton should place this trust in you. I wouldn’t for the world have it otherwise, dear.”

“You’re not afraid of being alone in a London lodging with my father? You wouldn’t have anyone with you during my absence?”

“Certainly not. What should I be afraid of? Nothing can be quieter than this house. My life, as you know, runs like a piece of clockwork now, without the very smallest variation from day to day. And I am quite content that it should be so. Therefore you may leave me, Rupert, with a quiet mind. You will go to the other side of the globe, and come back and find me stitching away as you left me; and I shall probably not exchange half a dozen words with any one but Mrs. Flaherty and Aunt Clo during your absence.”

“That is just what I should wish, Olive, and that is why I should particularly object to Westbrook’s finding his way here now. It seems brutal to condemn you to this solitude, my dear; but I know the world, and I know you must be doubly careful when you are virtually left alone. You have no women-friends; and as to men, if you should want assistance or advice during my absence, you have Mr. Claxton to apply to — the kindest man alive. In our present position, the quieter you keep, the fewer people you see, the better. It shan't be always so; but while I am away you must promise me to close your convent-doors more carefully than ever."

There was, no doubt, a certain savour of pride in what Rupert believed to be simply a wise prevision for his sister's welfare. But wise and foolish alike, how futile are such previsions against the great network of circumstances which life is perpetually weaving around us!

Three weeks later, Rupert Marston embarked at Southampton for Jamaica.

CHAPTER XII.

Dropped on the Stairs.

THE condition of Olivia Marston's mind at this time was one common enough in real life, I believe, especially among women of imagination and sensibility, but seldom permitted by novelists to their first-class heroines. She had been dazzled and captivated for a season by a man of a very inferior stamp. The strong hand of her brother had held her back before it had been too late; yet still her eyes were scarcely opened to behold good from evil. She could not but believe still that Rupert was unjust towards Westbrook.

She had not given up in her heart of hearts "making allowances" for him: the energy with which she agreed with Rupert that Westbrook was not to come to the house, proved, perhaps more than anything, that she mistrusted her own strength.

Olivia had been too much occupied about others during the past three months to think of herself, and to indulge in any sentimentality, had she been so disposed.

Active work is the best antidote for every species of moral disease; and as yet the girl's healthy mind could scarcely be said to have imbibed any infection. The time was come, however, now that she was to be silent during all the long evenings that her father dozed, and companionless at the early breakfasts, when her mind, with so many additional hours for reflection, might not improbably return to the happy days of the past spring, and linger over them. An incident apparently trivial, but fraught with grave consequences, occurred just then.

It was early in January when Rupert sailed. In the course of the following week Mrs. Flaherty told Olivia, with a radiant face, that her third floor was at last let, and let very well too, to a quiet elderly lady named Crosbie and her niece. Unexceptionable references: The Rev. Mr. Sparshott, Union Chapel; and Mr. Jonas Unguent, Secretary to the Society for the Secret Distribution of Tracts in the Papal States. The ladies were to take possession in a few days.

Olivia was sitting at the parlour window when the cab containing the new lodgers arrived. There was a great deal of luggage, comprising sundry hair-trunks, bandboxes, and paper-parcels; an old-fashioned desk in a green baize cover, several music-books, and a bird-cage. A thin woman of fifty, with a hard pinched face and grey hair, dressed in black, stepped from the cab. There was a general hollowness about this person's figure, as though the front of it had been scooped out, and the shoulders were penuriously trying to meet, which suited the expression of her face. Olivia had full opportunity to watch it, as its owner stood haggling with the cabman over his fare. To her companion this operation seemed to be profoundly displeasing. She knit her brow and bit her pretty lips, and after supplicating the elder lady to yield to the man's demand, however great the extortion might be, she drew out a smart leather purse from her own pocket, and, placing a shilling in the man's hand, ran swiftly up the steps of the house, leaving her companion to follow.

The contrast between aunt and niece, if such they were, was indeed complete. A little plump figure, a complexion of lilies and roses, a profusion of golden hair, a lovely little nez retroussé, with delicate nostrils, like pale pink shells, the whitest teeth, the neatest ankle, the sweetest, most child-like expression of face — Olivia examined her attentively as she stood there, with the birdcage in her hand, tapping impatiently with her foot, while her aunt discussed the extra shilling with cabby. And Olivia made up her mind that this was one of the prettiest creatures she had ever beheld. The flaw — for of course a woman's keen scrutiny detected the flaw — was in her eyes. They were small grey eyes; with a greenish light in them, and were not altogether harmonious with the rest of the face — though capable of more expression, possibly, than softer eyes might have been. They were like the eyes of a clever child, clear and keen, unless when veiled by the mist of tender emotion, and appearing, when under the influence of passion, to burn up until the pupils became no more than two specks of concentrated flame. It is probable that she saw Olivia at the window; for just when her impatience at the squabble between her aunt and cabby was most demonstrative, she turned her head quickly round, and then it was she drew out her own purse. Her dress formed as great a contrast to her aunt's as everything else about her: it was bright and gay, though in good taste, and certainly did not indicate poverty.

At an early hour two or three mornings after, Olivia heard from the room above hers the sound of a powerful high voice practising scales and exercises, followed by Italian Opera airs, certain passages in which were sung over and over again, until the singer had attained greater precision of execution. Olivia then threw up her window; her neighbour overhead had already opened hers. It was a fine winter's morning; a thin frosty mist hung over the river, through which the sun was beginning to gleam; and the canary upon the window-ledge up above, rejoicing in those first rays, was emulating his mistress in his wild flights of song. Though the harmony thus produced was doubtful, Olivia listened with pleasure. A bird's song and a fresh voice in the early morning have hints of the country and of spring-time in them, doubly dear in murky London. Presently the singer left off, and came to the window. Then followed a trio, of which Olivia caught some fragments.

"Oh, zu noisy Dicky! eat this sugar, sir, and be quiet—do. I can't hear myself, zu make such a row, zu troublesome Dicky! Three times I've tried to get that B flat, and ——"

"Clara," said a harsh voice, belonging no doubt to Mrs. Crosbie, "you'll have no voice to-night if you remain at that window. Come away, and don't be a fool with that bird."

"Twee-twee-twee-twee-twee," remonstrated Dicky, in a high counter-treble.

"No, Dicky!" broke in the soprano with a light laugh. It's no use, zu foolish little bird. We must come away from the window, because a nasty cross aunt says we must, and I shall throw a cloth over your cage, zu chatterbox. Come, give me a kiss."

And Olivia, raising her eyes, could see the fair face of the young singer pouting her rosy lips forward towards the cage, which she had swung outside the ledge, and the occupant of which, twittering as he hopped along his perch, thrust his little beak through the bars to greet his mistress.

"Come, Clara," rose the harsh contralto voice in the trio once more, "don't fool away your time there; it worrits me to death, it does; and there's your rehearsal at eleven o'clock too, and you haven't gone through your part yet. You're the most thoughtless creature! I do believe you'd lose your head if I wasn't there to look after you. To think you're a married woman, too, going on just for all the world like a child. I wonder you're not ashamed."

The married woman knit her pretty brows and hummed in a sort of wilful, defiant way, as she looked up and down the river, without vouchsafing any reply; then, unhooking the cage, she muttered, as she took it in — "Well, Dicky, zu and I will fly away together some day, won't we?" And the window was shut down.

The listener below sat pondering some time as to the history and condition of the lodgers overhead. It seemed that the younger lady was a professional singer, and, stranger still, that she was a married woman.

In such an uneventful life as Olivia's even a trifling incident is capable of stirring the still water, as the smallest pebble dropped into a well creates a disturbance little commensurate with its size. And before the afternoon was past this pebble was followed by another.

Olivia heard the two ladies pass her door and go down-stairs, towards noon. A few minutes later she herself went out, having a commission in the Strand, which she took advantage of her father's being on the terrace with Fritz's arm to execute, so that he should not miss her. As she opened the house door, Mr. Thompson was just putting in his latch-key to enter. He drew back and bowed. They had not seen each other face to face since that evening nearly a month ago. This time their eyes met, and Olivia felt that his were bent with keen scrutiny on hers.

When she reached home half an hour later, a letter directed to her was lying on the table. It was carefully sealed with a coat of arms surmounted with the crest of a man in armour; for Olivia, after the manner of many women, inspected the letter minutely before opening it, instead of taking the more obvious method of satisfying her curiosity at once.

The letter contained another, crumpled, and the envelope of which was partially torn. Upon the half-sheet of paper which enclosed it were written these words:

"Mr. Thompson presents his compliments to Miss Marston, and begs to enclose a letter which he believes belongs to her, as he found it on the stairs a few minutes ago."

All that was left of the superscription on the enclosed letter was the syllable ston, and the words Terrace, Strand. The writing did not seem altogether unfamiliar to Olivia, though she felt sure the letter was not hers. It might be Rupert's; but if so, how did it come upon the stairs, nearly three weeks after he had sailed?

To satisfy herself on this point she opened the letter, though not without a certain hesitation.

It began, without name or other indication to whom the words were addressed, thus:

"What is the use of recrimination? Your conduct has certainly deprived you of any right —"

She read no more, but hastily turned the leaf and looked for the signature. There was none. No date; nothing to show whence the letter came.

She sat looking at the fire for some minutes, pondering what she should do; how she should discover for whom the letter was intended, so as not to give a document which seemed of an unusually private nature into wrong hands; and how, in default of this knowledge, she could restore it, without risk of a similar error, to the writer.

The first question was, whether or not the letter was addressed to Rupert. In the words Olivia had read, there was nothing to show that this was not the case. But the letter had been dropped by some one on the stairs, and Olivia remembered that Mrs. Crosbie and her niece had gone out just before her. Might it not belong to the latter, whose name she had not yet heard? When she looked again at the torn cover, she observed, what had escaped her notice before, that the paper was intact after the syllable ston, consequently no Esqr. had ever formed a portion of the address. She rang the bell and asked for Mrs. Flaherty.

"Mrs. Flaherty, can you tell me the name of the youngest of your new lodgers? I think you said the aunt was Mrs. Crosbie; but the niece?"

"It'll be Alliston, or Illiston, or some sich a name, I'm thinkin', miss. Annyways, she's a missis."

"Ah! so I fancied; and you know that it's a name ending with ston? That's all I wanted to know."

"I saw it wrote on a letter this mornin', miss; for she says to me, says she, 'You mind and be very partic'lar, Mrs. Flaherty, and bring me letthers to me, and not to me aunt;' so I took it up to her with these very hands."

"Then this letter, no doubt, belongs to her. Perhaps it is the very one you took in?"

"Sure it is, thin, miss. I mind there was that big blot in the corner. If ye plase, I'll give it to her when she comes in."

"No, I will take it to her myself. I think she would rather that I explained to her how it was found."

Olivia could no longer doubt to whom the letter in her possession was addressed. She felt tempted for a moment to return it to Mr. Thompson, simply stating that the letter was not hers. The few words she had read of it indicated that possibly the clue to some secret of grave importance might be contained in the remainder.

She did not believe that Mr. Thompson had read the letter, for he bore the stamp of a true gentleman; but he might have done so in his endeavour to learn for whom it was intended. Was she to allow him to continue to believe that this person was herself? On the other hand, was she justified in delivering back into a stranger's hands so important a paper, now that she knew positively whose it was? She decided without much hesitation that she was not so justified.

She dropped the letter into a larger cover, within which she wrote, on a separate sheet, these words:

"Miss Marston presents her compliments to Mrs. Elliston, and begs to return her a letter found on the stairs this afternoon, and which was brought by mistake to Miss Marston. The torn state of the cover will account for this, together with the last syllable of both names being the same; but Miss Marston, seeing at a glance that the letter is not hers, loses no time in restoring it into Mrs. Elliston's hands."

Half an hour later the ladies returned; and Fritz, knocking at the door of the third floor, gave the letter to Mrs. Elliston herself.

It certainly in no way concerned Olivia what the new lodger's correspondence or past history might be, yet she could not avoid some speculation on the subject. She was puzzled, and rather annoyed, by the circumstance altogether: puzzled, inasmuch as the handwriting certainly seemed one she knew; annoyed, because of the part she herself played in this, as regarded the lodger on the first floor. She said to herself that it was of little importance, after all, what this painter thought about her; but still she was annoyed.

By-and-by, with her shawl and bonnet on her arm, she stole from the room where her father dozed, to make her simple toilette arrangements before dinner.

Just as she reached the first landing, Mr. Thompson came out of his room. He turned the key of the door, and pocketed it; he was leaving his apartment, as usual, for the day. Olivia hesitated a moment; then her foreign breeding emboldened her to do with perfect simplicity what to many English girls would have seemed difficult, if not impossible.

"Sir," she said, turning round, with her hand upon the banister, and her clear truthful eyes raised to his, "you sent me a letter to-day which you found upon the stairs, I think? I wish you to know that it was not mine — that it was not addressed to me. I did not trouble you with it again, for I learnt who was its rightful owner, and I have returned it to her."

This Mr. Thompson was an odd man. He bowed, and looked at her with a strange puzzled expression of face, in which admiration was blent with something else half sad, half cynical; but he said nothing.

He stood there for a moment, looking after her as she passed upwards; then, with a sigh, he went down the stair, and left the house.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Lodger on the Third Floor.

THERE was a knock at the door. "Come in," said Olivia. She was standing before the glass as the door opened, and Mrs. Elliston appeared.

Olivia looked at her visitor with some surprise. Mrs. Elliston was pale, but even prettier than Olivia had thought. She closed the door quietly, and drew near Miss Marston, lowering her eyes as she did so. Then she spoke, rapidly and somewhat indistinctly, for her voice trembled.

"You sent me a letter just now, Miss Marston?"

"I did."

"I am come here to implore a great favour of you. You read it; of course you did. You could not have known it was mine, otherwise. You are kind — you are good — I know you are. Oh! for God's sake, don't — don't —"

"Mrs. Elliston, I read nothing but the first two lines of that letter. You may rest perfectly satisfied that I know nothing of the contents. Mrs. Flaherty recognised the cover of the letter, as having given it to you this morning. That is how I came to know it was yours."

"You are generous," said her visitor, shaking her head, and colouring. "You wish to spare me; but, oh! Miss Marston, I think — I do believe that I may trust you. I do not think, with that face, you would betray me. If you will swear to keep my secret, I will tell you all — all —"

●

"Stop. Pray consider what you are saying. I am a perfect stranger to you. I have no wish to hear your confidences. I repeat that I did not read that letter, and can assure you I know nothing whatever of your affairs."

Mrs. Elliston scanned Olivia's face keenly. Then, with the impetuous movement of a child, she seized her hand.

"If so, you are a wonderful woman. Not to read an open letter! But I am not afraid of you. Ah! if you would only be my friend. Do you know, I haven't a friend in the world."

"Not a friend? Are you not living with an aunt?"

"Oh, yes" — here she sighed; "but as to ever making a friend of her — as to ever telling her anything — you don't know what my life is with her."

"Is she not kind to you?"

"Oh, in her own way; but she is so stingy and straightlaced, and she leads me such a life. She hasn't a grain of imagination or enthusiasm, poor woman, and she can't understand anything. It's a dreadful trial to live with her. She worries me from morning till night, and I'm sure I can't help it."

"Can't help what?" asked Olivia, bluntly.

"Doing things she doesn't like. If she ever was young she forgets it, and expects every one to pass their life as she does, in preaching, and scolding, and praying. Isn't it hard to be always doing what's right?"

Olivia could not help smiling.

"Not only hard, but impossible," she said. "Why do you live with your aunt if you dislike it so very much?"

"Why, you see, I was still a girl when I became a widow."

"Oh! you are a widow?"

"Yes, that was more than three years ago; and they all said that I — I was too young to live alone, particularly being on the stage."

"You sing at a theatre, then, do you?"

"Yes, saloons and theatres I've been singing at — that was only because I was beginning, you know. Now they say I'm quite fit for the Italian Opera, only I shall never get an engagement if I don't change my name. I've a splendid voice."

Olivia smiled at this naïf announcement.

"And I'm so fond of it!" she continued. "There's nothing in the world I love so much; and when I act, I forget everything in the excitement. And then the applause afterwards! Only Aunt Crosbie is such a damper to one's spirits — she can't understand an artiste's enthusiasm. And oh! her preaching!"

"Poor little thing!" thought Olivia; "obliged to work for her bread, and, with this excitable temperament, condemned to live with a cross old woman — it is a hard lot."

Still the recollection of that letter obtruded itself not altogether pleasantly.

"Does your aunt go with you always to the theatre, Mrs. Elliston?"

"Generally, when she is not laid up with rheumatism. Will you go with me next time? Oh, do. I don't think Aunt Crosbie can go on Monday; she is quite laid up to-day."

"I never leave my father of an evening," said Olivia, quietly, as though the proposal were not an unusual one. "But I can fancy that Mrs. Crosbie doesn't like your going alone. You are too young and pretty for that."

"That is what they all say," pouted the little widow. "It is better to be old and ugly, I believe, for then one is left in peace to do as one likes. Oh, dear me!" she added, with a piteous sigh, "I've had trouble enough, I'm sure. This life is very hard indeed to women who are not made of iron and granite. Don't you think so?"

Olivia looked into that rosebud face; it seemed strange that suffering should have left absolutely no trace there.

"All of us, I suppose, have our trials, men and women alike; if, as you say, we are not made of granite."

"Oh! as to men, I never pity them. A married woman, I suppose you think, oughtn't to say so? But I wasn't happy in my married life."

"It must have been a very short one?"

"More than two years," she replied.

The little woman's eyes were filled with tears, and again Olivia's heart-strings were loosened towards her. But as she did not see exactly what to say, she remained silent. Mrs. Elliston went on:

"I have suffered too much through men to have much feeling or much opinion of them. But I have no right to intrude my troubles on you," she added, quickly, as though she had been surprised into saying more than she intended. She looked with those small but penetrating eyes of hers into Olivia's face once more, and then began a fresh sentence. "You are very kind to me. Few women would be so kind to another whom they knew nothing about. I wish — would it be asking too much? — I wish I might come and see you sometimes."

Had Olivia been a prudent English-bred young lady, she would have offered no encouragement to an acquaintanceship begun under such strange auspices. As it was, she felt touched by the forlorn condition of the little singer. Could it do her any harm to stretch forth a kindly hand towards her?

"We are very near neighbours," she began. "If I can be of any use to you at any time —"

"Oh! may I come and sit with you sometimes? If you will only let me come and talk to you about myself, when Aunt Crosbie worries me, you don't know what a comfort it will be."

"I am almost always with my father, and he doesn't see strangers," said Olivia. Then, because her kind heart felt for the young woman, she added, with a little hesitation, "but when I am alone, if you want anything — if I can do anything for you —"

"Will you come and see Aunt Crosbie? It will be so kind of you, Miss Marston. I don't know how I can be bold enough to ask you, for she is very disagreeable, poor old soul! But she is laid up now, and it will put her into better humour with me, perhaps, and you'll see, too, what I've got to put up with. And then I can sing to you. I should like you to hear me sing. You haven't got a piano, I suppose? You don't know what an effect I make in 'Ah! non credea.' They said I drew tears from a Cabinet minister and two members of Parliament one night."

Olivia was amused and laughed, as she would at the vain but innocent prattle of a child.

"I shall like very much to hear you sing, but it must be in your own room some day. My piano is down-stairs where my father sits, and he doesn't see strangers. I have heard you, however, already through the ceiling, and know that you have a lovely voice. I have often wished my brother could hear you, he is so passionately fond of music."

"What! have you a brother?" said the little widow, opening her eyes. "I thought you were an only child. Where is your brother, Miss Marston?"

"A long way off just now. In the West Indies."

"And how long is he going to remain there?"

"I hope not many months. He is in Mr. Claxton's house, and they have sent Rupert on a special mission ——"

"Rupert! and Claxton! Dear me, it must be the same young man! How very odd. Isn't your brother dark, with a hooked nose? And he has no whiskers, only a very small moustache?"

"Yes. Where have you ever met him?"

Mrs. Elliston laughed very merrily.

"Only once, in an omnibus, some months ago; but, you see, he made an impression. We never spoke, only he did stare so very much that I couldn't help noticing him more than I should otherwise have done, particularly as he sat just opposite, and was so polite in jumping out to help me, and in picking up all the music I dropped, and in hailing the other omnibus — the Highgate one — for me. Oh, I should know him anywhere again."

"But, after all, how do you know it was my brother? How did you find out his name?"

"He had a lot of letters and papers in his hand — law or business things of some kind, I suppose, for most of them were directed in a large clerkly hand — and sitting where I did, I couldn't help seeing the address on one or two: 'Rupert Marston, Esq., at Messrs. Claxton's, Broadway.'"

"There can be no doubt about it," said Olivia; "and now I come to think of it, I remember his mentioning having met you. It must have been you from the description."

"It is quite like some sort of tie — some kind of introduction, isn't it? I must run away now, Miss Marston, for my aunt's dinner is waiting; but I am so glad to have made your acquaintance. And only think of its being all through that horrid letter. Oh! you can't tell how you have relieved my mind. I am sure you are a woman whom I can trust and make a friend of. Do, please, be my friend — won't you?"

She looked up once more in her pretty childish way, and Olivia felt more strongly than ever the kind of fascination which a seductive kitten exercises over certain natures — a foolish little animal, with not half the fine qualities of a horse or a dog, but asking to be caressed, and impossible not to be forgiven its tricks and petty misdemeanours.

She promised to call on Mrs. Crosbie the first day that she was free; and having extracted this promise, Mrs. Elliston departed.

CHAPTER XIV.

From Jamaica to London and Back.

A FEW days later brought Rupert's first letter, by the mail which left Jamaica a fortnight after his arrival there. He wrote in good spirits, and gave an excellent account of himself. The climate at that season was charming, "and in three or four months," he wrote, "I expect my business here will be concluded and I shall be home again. Mind you tell me everything that happens, for I can't help being anxious about you. I wish you had some one woman friend near you; however, please God, you will not be left alone very long. My life here is likely to be very uneventful. The settlement of plantation accounts, the examination of returns, and invoices, and claims, fill up my day. I have no society — no ladies' society, that is to say — but I have made the acquaintance of a right good fellow who is quartered here — Henry Pomfret. We met by accident, and I knew him at once from his likeness to his youngest sister. He is uncommonly handsome, and has that cheery off-hand manner which army men so often acquire, and City men seldom do. I have dined at his mess twice. He is as different from that poor creature Lionel as chalk from cheese. I am sorry to say he leaves for England in a few weeks' time, as he has sent in his papers to sell. Heirs apparent can't be allowed to waste their sweetness in Jamaica. He is going to join his people at Nice; but they are all to be in England in the summer, he says. Caverton is to be sold; Mrs. Pomfret dislikes the idea of returning there. They will probably take some other place in another part of the country."

In Olivia's answer to this letter, by the next mail, she wrote thus of her father:

"He sleeps more, and is more disinclined to exertion than formerly; otherwise he is really very little changed. He can walk as well as ever again, but always tries to avoid his little treadmill if possible. He is so patient — so unsuspicious. I have never had any difficulty in keeping all that would be painful from him. He is certainly deafer, and takes less notice of things — that makes it easier. Don't be the least anxious about me. I never was better, and I assure you I want no 'woman friend,' though, in an unexpected way, one has appeared on my very narrow stage. We have two new lodgers au troisième, an aunt and niece; the latter an acquaintance of yours — at least you very vividly and faithfully described her to us some eight months ago. There is a puzzle for you! Do you remember a wonderfully pretty little person you once met in an omnibus, and came home raving about? She remembers you perfectly; even recollected your name, which she read on the back of your letters. We became acquainted by her dropping something on the stairs. She lives with an old dragon of an aunt, who is a Dissenter as far as I can make out, and, curious to say, the niece is on the stage — an odd combination. To complete the strangeness of this childlike little person's position, she is a widow. I could scarcely believe it when she told me. Her naïve vanity is so amusing! there cannot be any guile, I think, about such a nature; and her position with this cross old aunt rather excites my interest. So, in all probability, as the poor little thing seems very friendless, and grateful for any word of kindness, we shall often meet.

"Mr. Thompson is still a mystery. Except Mrs. Flaherty, no one has ever yet heard the sound of his voice. We have met on the stairs, and once I even spoke to him about something that had been dropped, but he only made me a solemn bow and passed on. I fancy Christopher Columbus in a shabby coat would not have been unlike our 'first floor.' I am glad you have met Henry Pomfret; it may lead to your renewing your intimacy with them some day. They have not answered my letter. How I look forward to your return! I am never sad or dull—you mustn't think that. I have plenty to occupy me, only it seems so cheerless of an evening to see your empty chair instead of you. . . . Aunt Clo comes here about once a week; she is much occupied now with a new, grand, and delightful friend of hers, Mrs. Quintus Smith. She asked me to go with a large party, headed by this Mrs. Q. S., to German Reed's on Monday last. Aunt Clo was very indignant that I was not duly impressed by the honour done me. She told me if I didn't 'mix,' I should never 'settle.' It sounds quite culinary, doesn't it?

"Father says that 'sending love' is a very absurd fashion. If people are properly attached, why, it is a matter of course; and if they are not, it is merely a useless form. So he won't send you any message. Isn't that like him?

"Ever your most affectionate sister,

"OLIVIA.

"P.S. — De Castro and Montalba have just been here, to say they are off to Lisbon next week. They, too, suffered, as you know, through Lozados, and it is on his business that they are now obliged to go to Portugal. I am very sorry for dear father's sake, as they look in so often, and he likes their visits. You know how horribly both the good men bore me, so, personally, they will be no loss. I have always Mr. Claxton to apply to in any difficulty."

Six weeks after this, Henry Pomfret landed at Southampton. He fully meant to have called on Mr. Marston in London, and to have given him tidings of Rupert; but a telegram, announcing Mr. Pomfret's dangerous illness, summoned the son to Nice a few hours after his landing. For nearly three weeks had Mr. Pomfret been lying in the most precarious state. It was some months before Olivia heard from Mrs. Pomfret. Her husband was well again then, and her handsome and excellent Henry was with them; but all the anxiety of this illness, following so soon upon the death of her beloved Lionel, had been almost too much for her. She wrote as though much broken down in health and energy. Though still surrounded by so many blessings, like Rachel, the poor mother refused to be comforted for the son who was not.

CHAPTER XV.

Two Aunts.

MISS PRINGLE is paying one of her weekly visits to her brother-in-law and niece.

She now lives in a small house in Bayswater, which she has taken furnished by the year, and where she gives frequent tea-parties, with whist, to such of her acquaintance as are open to these seductions. The house is in a region of new brick and mortar, and is reached from London through acres and acres of dry, uninteresting streets, but it is not far from Kensington Gardens, and it is eminently "a genteel residence," so Miss Pringle is well contented.

She is often urgent on Olivia "to mix," and occasionally presents her with some impossible piece of finery as an incentive to that end; at the same time she most scrupulously guards the secret of Olivia's present abode, though moved thereto by other motives than her niece's. But, indeed, it is not uncommon in life to see very different causes conduce to one result.

Let us hear what she says on this matter in the course of that morning's visit.

"My dear, who do you think I met in the Burlington Arcade this afternoon? You can't possibly guess. Your admirer, the big man, who used to trumpet away of an evening at the Pomfrets, and who rowed up the river so often, and was vastly civil about the ball. What's his name? — Westbrook, that's it. He immediately rushed up; it was really very flattering, though I was rather embarrassed. I was looking at a bonnet in the window of that shop on the left-hand side going up — a sweet thing in pink — when I heard my name, and, turning round, found the big man bending over me. And really, in the Burlington Arcade, and altogether, I was quite — I scarcely knew whether — in short, I was a little confused for a moment, seeing people stare so as they passed at the meeting, which looked, you know — though, indeed, I should think they ought to be pretty well accustomed to that sort of thing there. However, he was most polite, and saw me to my brougham (I was glad I wasn't in a cab); and oh! by the bye, he asked a great deal after you."

"You didn't give him our direction, Aunt Clo?"

She felt her heart beating quicker. Did she wish him to find her out? Of course not. Had she not herself sent him away from the Cedars? Nothing would annoy Rupert so much as Westbrook's coming here. Of course she didn't wish it; and Aunt Clo's reply, no doubt, reassured her.

"No, my dear — no. Living, as you do, at present, in such a very ungentleel quarter, I don't think it is to your advantage that people should know where you are. I can assure you I had great difficulty in putting him off, however, he was so very curious. I gave my address, of course, and I invited him to my next little evening party, where I said he would perhaps meet you."

The idea of Westbrook doomed to spend the evening among a set of card-playing old ladies, nearly made Olivia laugh, in spite of her vexation.

"But, Aunt Clo, you know I never go to you of an evening, so how could you tell Mr. Westbrook that?"

"Well, I didn't know that you mightn't like to come and meet him," said Aunt Clo, rather spitefully. "You used to like talking to the young man, I remember, and thought his trumpet delightful, I believe. And he rowed in a great heat several times to the Cedars, and you seemed to think him vastly agreeable, when he sat on the lawn and smoked — so I couldn't tell, my dear, that you mightn't like to see him again."

"If I had wished it, aunt, should I have taken any pains to conceal where we are living?"

"Why, as to that, one would be really ashamed to ask any one to come here, down in this low neighbourhood, by the river. I do hope, when Rupert returns, that you may be able to move to something a little more respectable, my love."

"Half the nobility lived here a century or two ago; Northumberland House is within a stone's throw of us."

"Well, my dear, I am glad I am not compelled to live here — that's all. I am sure, with my select circle of friends, I should lose half of them." (Olivia thought this not impossible, and moralised on the worth of such "friendships," when Aunt Clo had taken her departure.) I never could expect Mrs. Quintus Smith, for instance, to come down here, and call on me. As to Mr. Westbrook, I know he's not a marrying man — his aunt told me so — besides which he has no money, so I never encouraged him, you know, my dear, beyond a certain point. He was civil and useful, and so forth." (If Westbrook could only have heard her!) "And provided he don't insist on playing his trumpet, I think he'll be a great acquisition to my little party. He and Mrs. Quintus Smith will suit, I know — moving quite in the same set. So even if you don't come, it doesn't signify. For really, between you and me, my dear, his manner to me was almost more than cordial — what you call marked. He even inquired where I went to church, and I fully expect to see him there next Sunday. Indeed, I remember a man, some years ago, at Harrowgate, who went regularly to church, and sat in front of me, and always turned round to kneel down, that he might look at me, which was very wrong, and calculated to disturb his thoughts, so I always frowned and shook my head, though I often felt touched by the poor man's piteous look of surprise when I did so. Where do you go to church, my dear?"

The works of Miss Pringle's tongue had run down, so she took breath upon a question. It needed but a simple answer — a mere touch — to set that admirable machinery in motion again.

"To the Temple in the afternoon, aunt. In the morning I generally read prayers with father."

"Poor dear man! I shouldn't think he could follow much, eh? Your papa is terribly broken, my dear. It is impossible to make him understand a word I say, and he does nothing but talk about the darkness in a way that is really absurd. His memory is quite gone, too. I was speaking to him of Miss M'Claverty's elopement, which created such a scandal when we were at Bath together with your poor dear mother seven-and-thirty years ago, and I was telling him I had seen her daughter yesterday, which I thought would interest him; but I found he had forgotten all about the mother and the coachman, and all the interesting details, which occupied the public mind so much at the time."

"Father never cared about gossip."

“As to that, there are, of course, different degrees of intelligence, and all people are not gifted with equally inquiring minds. But like the man in the play, my dear, your father likes to sup full of horrors, eh? Any gossip of a frightful or appalling kind he is still alive to, I observe. Indeed, I never come here, but he asks me whether there have been any bad accidents — which is hardly Christianly, I think.”

“If more Christians were like him, the world would be a better place than it is,” said his daughter, firing up. “He is kindness itself, and would not hurt a fly. But the manly love of adventure, which any one can see he had as a young man, makes him still delight in hearing of hair-breadth escapes, from which courage and presence of mind have extricated men. You ought to have known him better, Aunt Clo.”

“My dear, I know that he was always an excellent man, — no one can say I ever said a word against him — only the infirmities of age are very trying, eh? and he certainly is, eh? terribly broken — there is no denying that. You couldn't keep the state of things from him, if it wasn't so (and it is next to impossible that it can continue). I'm sure it must be a great strain upon you, my dear, and if it goes on much longer — this constant watching and waiting on the poor man, and this habitual life of deception — you will be worn to a thread. You are as thin as possible now, and your complexion is horridly yellow. Do you ever use the milk of roses I gave you? I shouldn't have kept my complexion as I have under so many trying circumstances (fancy that horrid girl, Jane, giving me warning again yesterday) if it hadn't been for that valuable wash.”

"Your anxiety about my health is quite unnecessary, aunt: I am perfectly well."

"So you say, my dear; but it's a very unnatural state of things. I only hope it won't go on;" and she rose and shook her petticoats for departure.

"I don't know what you mean by an 'unnatural state of things;' and as to its 'going on,' I hope everything will go on exactly as it is until Rupert's return. Good-bye, aunt."

So the old lady went her way, having succeeded in irritating her niece by more than one of her little speeches.

She sat down and thought what she should do if Westbrook found her out, and called. It would be very pleasant to see him again; to hear that most musical voice saying even common-place words; to meet those handsome eyes once more. She did not deny it. But no doubt it was much better as it was. Still she thought a good deal about him all that day. He had not forgotten her. That is always a strong claim in a woman's eyes. She wondered whether he ever bore in mind what she had said to him the last time they met — whether he was an improved man — whether Rupert would always think as badly of him as he now did. She certainly thought a great deal about him all that day.

Olivia, according to her promise, called on Mrs. Crosbie. The stern, iron-grey woman, she had seen only once before, was seated on a horsehair sofa, having a cup of chamomile tea, or some bitter drink in her hand, which she seemed to be deliberately sipping. There was neither book nor work on the table before her: only a silver watch — almost a clock in dimensions — stood there, in its case, at such an angle relatively to its owner, that her eye fell readily on the dial. She was an uncomfortable-looking woman, and everything about her looked hard and unpromising. The extreme hollowness of her figure and sparseness of petticoat, joined to the sharp lines of her face, produced the same impression on her visitor now that they had done on the day of Mrs. Crosbie's arrival.

She glanced to the other end of the room: Mrs. Elliston was not there; but there stood her open piano, her canary, a large bunch of violets, a few ragged-looking books, and some woman's work. The contrast between the two ends of the room was as complete as between the aunt and niece who dwelt there.

"Mrs. Elliston is out, ma'am," began Mrs. Crosbie, almost before her visitor had entered.

"My visit was to you, Mrs. Crosbie — by your niece's request," said Olivia, rather shyly. "But perhaps as you are not well, you had rather —"

"You will excuse my rising. I can't stand; but take a chair, ma'am. You're Miss Marston, I suppose?"

"I am; and being in the same house —"

"My niece came down and scraped acquaintance with you about some book or other she had dropped? She told me so much; and I'm glad she should have made some respectable acquaintance. I inquired of Mrs. Flaherty all about you. Clara picks up a lot o' people at the theatre that I never allow to darken my doors. I won't have no actors nor actresses here. That she knows. Sit down, ma'am."

"I hope you are feeling better," hazarded Olivia, after a pause.

"No, Miss Marston, no better."

"The season is very trying just now — so much fog. You will be better as the spring comes on."

Mrs. Crosbie gulped her chamomile, and said —

"I'm old, Miss Marston, and old people must have ailments. I'm only troubled about one thing — I can't go about and look after that girl when I'm like this."

"Do you mean Mrs. Elliston?"

"Yes; for all she's a widow, she's as incapable of taking care of herself as a new-born babe. Some people never do learn no sense."

"She is very young."

"Twenty-two," responded Mrs. Crosbie; "and that's old enough to have sense, I suppose?"

"Has she been long a widow?"

"Three years. Her husband was a poor creature, I fancy — never kept her in no order, and left her without a farthing when he died. That's the way with most of 'em."

"Was he an actor?"

"Yes; that and his pretty face took the girl. I never saw him. I was out in Canada with my husband when they married. I thought it a foolish business when my sister wrote to tell me — and she was never troubled with too much sense, but it was no business of mine."

"They must have been married a very short time?"

"Better than two years. I came home when Crosbie died (my sister was dead too), and found this girl, her only child, a widow, without a penny. So I took her to live with me."

"That was very kind."

"No it wasn't, ma'am. It was my dooty; no more. But after a few months, as I wasn't rich enough to keep her, having nothing but my pension as Crosbie's widow, she went back to her singing, and to the stage. I suppose I needn't hardly say, it ain't what I like. The Rev. Mr. Sparshott is always at me about it. I make her listen to two or three prayers from The Futility of Good Works every day. Do you know that precious book, ma'am? Upwards of sixty thousand in circulation — price one and sixpence. Happy to supply you with a copy. Well, I can't do no more for Clara than show her the danger of her paths."

"Are you afraid, then, of her trusting too much to her own good works?" asked Olivia — for this seemed the obvious deduction.

"It would be hard to say what they was," returned Mrs. Crosbie. "No, ma'am, but she's awful vain, and the Lord has given her a voice, and, except a pretty face, very little besides. However, the girl must make her living. I can't do no more than I do. I can't support her entirely."

"Of course: and there is no harm in singing, Mrs. Crosbie?"

"I don't think much of it myself," replied that lady, gloomily. "I've mostly found singing and bad company go together. And the worst of it is, I can't be always with Clara, though a widow of twenty-two ought to be able to take care of herself — there's no gainsaying that. But she takes as much looking after as a child — always running up bills, and forestalling her week's salary, and never knowing what she's got. There isn't a day that I shouldn't like to give her a good shaking for some stoopid thing she's done. She is enough to provoke a saint, she is. Sometimes I half make up my mind to leave her, and let her get on as well as she can alone."

"Oh, Mrs. Crosbie, I'm sure you'll never do that! You'll never desert your niece, however tiresome and provoking she is. The more helpless or imprudent, the more she wants you, and you are too kind, I am sure, to give her up."

"No, I ain't a bit kind, Miss Marston. If I does it, it's because it's my dooty. I saw my dooty plain to Crosbie, and I did it for five-and-thirty year, though he wasn't a good husband to me — so I'm accustomed to worriting and bother, and to do my dooty, however nasty it may be. But Clara does try me, there's no denying that."

It struck Olivia that the widow's duty to her husband might be better fulfilled by observing a silence as to his demerits: she only said, however,

"Your niece is very attractive, and is sure to marry again, and then you will be relieved from this responsibility."

"That's just one of the things I'm most afraid of! She'll accept the first good-looking man who makes love to her, without ever thinking whether he can support her, or whether she won't have to support him. If he should have a tenor voice into the bargain, then it's all up with her. She's a fool."

Olivia could not help laughing: but Mrs. Crosbie continued, without the spark of a smile,

"Take my advice, young lady. Keep unmarried. When a woman is fortunate enough to become a widow, it is the height of madness for her ever to dream of taking another husband."

Surely, thought Olivia, no two women were ever less fit to live together than this aunt and niece. How much better Aunt Clo would suit Mrs. Elliston as a companion. What a pity, the lively, frivolous, dressy old lady could not change places with this grim Mrs. Crosbie!

As this idea crossed her mind, the young widow herself was heard running up-stairs, and came bounding into the room, with the demeanour of a school-girl of fourteen rather than that of a widow of three years' standing.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Lost Clock.

HER cheeks were glowing from a rapid walk: her eyes were greener and more sparkling than ever. Her dress being "kilted" from the mud, over the brightest of striped petticoats, showed a tidy little foot and a neat ankle. She had a large roll of music in her hand.

"Oh! you dear, kind creature!" she exclaimed, running up to Olivia. "How good of you to come and see Aunt Crosbie, while I was at my horrid rehearsal, screaming my poor lungs out, and making myself such a fright as never was, what with the dust, and the exertion of going all round the stage upon my knees after that stupid little tenor, I don't know how many times!"

She ran to the looking-glass, and examined herself, smoothing her hair, which was ever so little ruffled, before she brought a chair to Olivia's side.

"That's a new muff, Clara!" exclaimed Mrs. Crosbie.

"Pray where did you get that? Another extravagance, I suppose!"

"Well, I don't remember exactly what it cost, but I know it was very cheap. And I couldn't act the Sonnambula with red fingers, could I, Miss Marston? My hands were so cold as I walked along, that I felt it was quite a duty I owed to society to warm them. By-the-by, I've got such a lovely new song, the conductor of the orchestra has written for me. Would you like to hear it?"

"Surely you must be tired now? Some other time."

"You'll not have a bit of voice to-night, if you begin screaming again," said Mrs. Crosbie. "Do try and see if you can't sit still for five minutes. There was a man came to be paid for some flowers while you were out. I wasn't going to pay him. Such nonsense! What's the good of flowers, I should like to know?"

"Cari fiori," began Mrs. Elliston, warbling the pathetic air from the Sonnambula, as though that were a sufficient answer to her aunt's question; then, stopping short, after a bar or two, "Only I've got to sing it in horrid English," she said, with a great sigh. "Listen, how bad it sounds."

She was an obstinate little woman, this widow Elliston, certainly. She ran to the piano, untied her bonnet-strings, and began. Perhaps she was determined that her new acquaintance should feel at once the influence of her strongest attraction. At all events she meant to sing: and she sang.

It was one of those lovely English voices, a fresh, full, clear soprano, unsurpassed in any country. It is true that half of it was lost in its passage through the throat, and some portion of the remainder behind the half-closed teeth. This is but saying that such cultivation as it had received had not been Italian. There was great natural facility; every roulade was as clear and true as possible; and there was something more than this, which no teaching can give, and without which all music falls dead on the ear. The soul of the little lady burnt passionately up through her song; she seemed to become ennobled as she sang; of a larger and deeper nature; such was the intensity of expression she threw into the music.

Olivia was amazed. Was this the same person she had been disposed to regard as a pretty garrulous little doll? In what depths lay hidden all these tender and stormy passions? Miss Marston had heard too much music, from her childhood (in Italy and Spain) upwards, not to perceive that the singer lacked almost everything save what Nature had given her. But what was it all compared with that?

"You are made to be a great artist," she said, leaning over the piano, upon her elbows, and looking into Mrs. Elliston's flushed face, as she finished, and threw herself back in her chair. "You only want to study. You have been given a wonderful voice, and what is rarer still, a power of passionate expression. You must feel every note of that, to sing it as you do. It depends on yourself how much, or how little, you make of these great gifts."

This was not the sort of recognition of her talents to which Mrs. Elliston was accustomed. A compliment, prospectively less lofty, actually and unconditionally more positive, would have pleased her better, it is to be feared. A daily surfeit of flattery is unwholesome feeding. She tossed her gold hair back with ever so little a pout, and her small bright eyes flashed as she said:

"I was a pupil of the Royal Academy for more than a year, and then I learnt of Prodgetti and of Scrogini before I—"

"Prodgers and Scroggs," said her aunt. "No more Italian than you are."

"Well, I always used to sing in Italian with them, and that's what they call themselves; and I don't know why you should try and make out that I've not had the best instruction, Aunt Crosbie, when you know I've still got to pay Scrogini ever so much for the next year of my engagement, and — and —"

She looked very excited, and as if she were about to cry.

"You are so very young," said Olivia, gently. "You can't expect to be perfect until you have had more experience. Rome was not built in a day. If you go on studying, we shall have you singing at the Italian Opera I dare say, instead of these small theatres and saloons."

"They all tell me that song is perfect," she said, naïvely.

("What a fool you are to believe them!" muttered Mrs. Crosbie.)

"I know what it is! It is because I'm not on the stage. In the theatre I'm quite different. I can't sing here. I never could in a low stuffy room. You must come and hear me at the theatre. I'm in white, you know, with all my hair down my back, and they say I look very well."

"I have no doubt you do. I must be content, however, to see and hear you here, for there is no chance of my doing so in the theatre."

Mrs. Elliston's simple vanity did not disgust Olivia as much as a more subtle essence of the same quality might have done. It was still the child — a spoiled child if you will — whose naïf self-satisfaction disarmed severity.

"I am very fond of it," she went on; "it excites me so. When I get a passionate burst like 'grace, grace,' in 'Robert, toi que j'aime,' I feel all the blood through my veins. Only I've such a horrid little tenor to sing with — scarcely any hair on his head, and fat hands, without any muscle! It is impossible to fancy one's self in love with him: and that destroys a great deal, you know."

"What does it signify what the man's like?" cried Mrs. Crosbie. "You've got to sing to him, and he has got to sing to you, for a couple of hours, and if he has not got a hair left on his head, and is as fat as a pig, what does that matter to you, pray?"

Mrs. Elliston looked at Olivia, and shrugged her shoulders, as who should say, "You see what it is to live with a person who has not a grain of sentiment or refinement. There is no use in answering her" — and so she was silent.

"You speak Italian?" asked Olivia.

"No, but I sing it. Oh! if I could only sing at the Italian Opera — how I should like that!"

"Still," objected Olivia, "it is essential to understand the language in which you sing. You can't give proper expression otherwise."

"Oh, I can make out enough for that, you know.

Of course if I had the opportunity I should like to learn. I know I've a good pronounciation."

"Would you like to read some Italian with me? I think I might be of use to you."

"Oh, how kind! That I should. Every day, for an hour? And not here?" she added, lowering her voice. "I may come down to you, mayn't I?"

Thus a daily intercourse between Olivia and her new acquaintance was established. It was difficult to believe that these two women should ever become intimate; yet intimacy of a certain kind very quickly ensued. It was, in fact, so eagerly sought by Mrs. Elliston, that it would have been difficult for Olivia, having once opened the door, to keep it resolutely ajar. If it be true that in love "il y a toujours l'un qui baise et l'un qui tend la joue," it is at least equally so in friendship. Rarely, if ever, are the hands stretched out simultaneously; and, without very good cause for avoidance, it is only an unsympathetic nature that allows the outstretched hand to drop untouched.

In spite of her vanity, wilfulness, and other little similar defects; in spite of the somewhat disagreeable circumstance which led to Olivia's first acquaintance with her, Mrs. Elliston continued to interest Miss Marston, and to induce her to make great allowances for her many shortcomings. "I have been knocked about the world like a football," she used to say. "I have never known a mother's care — never had any one to teach me anything, except music at the Royal Academy. All I know I have taught myself; and at seventeen I was told to marry my husband, whom I didn't care twopence about, and who didn't know what love was; — a cold —"

"Please don't say anything about your late husband. It pains me to hear you talk like that," interrupted Olivia, quickly.

The widow's introduction to Mr. Marston was very simply effected; and it was a circumstance that tended to facilitate the constant visits of this "neighbour" (as she was called) that the blind man took an uncommon fancy to her. She brought him books; she talked to him, and condoled with him upon the weather — the degeneracy in lamp-oil — the scandalous quality of fuel in the present day. He liked her blithe young voice; and Olivia was sensible of her kindness to the old man. But, indeed, she learnt that there was a great deal of kindness, and thoughtfulness too, in the apparently giddy widow. Olivia happened once to name a poor family in the neighbourhood whom she used to visit constantly. It was one of the few out-of-door subjects of interest she possessed. The mother was bedridden; the father was a hardworking artisan, and there were six helpless children. Olivia taught the eldest of these children to sew; and any little shreds of work, or scraps from dinner that she could save, were carried to these poor people. Mrs. Elliston begged the next time to be allowed to go with her; and after that scarce a day passed without her bringing down to Olivia something — a slice of seed-cake, a couple of oranges, odds and ends of her wardrobe — for the sick woman or her children. Was all this from a desire to ingratiate herself with Miss Marston? Partly, perhaps; but let us give her the advantage of the doubt. It was pleasant to Mrs. Elliston to do kind or charitable actions — pleasanter, indeed, than to do strictly just ones.

Nearly three weeks passed. Almost every day Olivia found some hour, early or late, when she and Mrs. Elliston were both free, and could read Le Notte Romane or Silvio Pellico in the furthest corner of the sitting-room down-stairs, while Mr. Marston dozed by the fire undisturbed by the low hum of voices. Mrs. Elliston was no tedious pupil. Quick and clever in all she set her mind to master, the progress she made from day to day astonished Olivia, and encouraged her to continue the kind task she had begun. The little lady was sometimes volatile, often tired, and once or twice tiresome; but she never forgot anything that Olivia told her: her ear was as keenly sensitive to accent as a child's, and her love of approbation stimulated her to imitate what she heard. They were very pleasant lessons to Olivia. The feeling, alone, that she was of use — that into her singularly isolated life, with its narrow round of daily duty, another interest, and possible good, had been brought — would have reconciled her to a less attractive pupil.

It was notable that as Mrs. Elliston grew intimate with Olivia, she shrank more and more from talking of the past. Sometimes she made a disparaging allusion to her late husband, like the one I have quoted, which Olivia always checked. But of the mystery which surrounded that letter she never spoke again. The confidence which a very little encouragement would have induced her in the first interview to give, there was no longer a disposition to offer. The impulse of the moment had been to tell all to the woman in whose power she believed herself to be. I think she hesitated for a long time to credit that Olivia had not read the letter: it was unlike anything in her experience. But as she learnt better that open and upright nature, and honestly clung to it, I do believe, as to one of the few good things with which she had ever come into close contact, so she desired more and more to guard a strict silence as to all concerning her past.

Olivia, on the other hand, often pondered over the mystery of the letter, and wondered what the dark passage in this little singer's life could be. Though she discouraged her talking of her husband in the contemptuous terms Mrs. Elliston used, Olivia would not have repelled her new friend's confidence on the subject of the letter, had it now been offered. But it never was.

One day there came a knock at the door.

It was a gentle, deprecatory knock, which had to be repeated before it cut short the thread of Italian in Mrs. Elliston's mouth.

Olivia rose and went to the door. A dark, picturesque, somewhat evil-looking man, in the conical hat of the Abruzzi, stood there, with a fawning smile, and sharp, vigilant black eyes, that glanced quickly round the room, even while he spoke to her.

"Scusa, Signorina — cerco il Signor Ton — Ton — Tonson——", and he went on more volubly to explain that, overhearing his beloved "lingua" being read as he passed the door, he had made bold to knock, and interrupt the young ladies.

Signor Thompson, the painter, lived on the first floor. The information was concisely given, and the man — a model, of course — with a lingering look at the room and its occupants turned away.

Olivia explained to her companion what the man had said.

"Why," exclaimed that astute little person, "should he knock at this door to ask something he knows quite well? I am sure I saw that man coming out of Mr. Thompson's room one day, a fortnight ago."

"Indeed!" said Olivia. "Then it must have been the seduction of your Italian that roused his curiosity to see what we were like in here. I wonder what Mr. Thompson is painting. The man hasn't a good face."

"I peeped in one day: the door was ajar——"

"My dear Mrs. Elliston!"

"I couldn't resist it. He had his back to me — had just come in. I saw a great canvas with some historical subject on it, and I think this man's head was just sketched in. He is a great bear, that Mr. Thompson."

"Why?"

"If I happen to drop anything on the stairs, he picks it up, bows in a glum way, and scarcely looks at me when I thank him, but stalks on. I wonder what he thinks himself!"

"What he thinks you is more to the purpose," said Olivia, quickly; "if you are in the habit of dropping things——"

She stopped abruptly, for the recollection of the letter flashed upon her. She had not meant to allude to it. She had in her mind the transparent coquetry of what she supposed to be the little widow's conduct, in dropping things purposely.

Mrs. Elliston did not wince. Neither did she seem to observe Olivia's sudden pause; but she changed the subject adroitly, nevertheless.

Three days later a very beautiful little clock which had belonged to Olivia's mother, and which Mr. Marston had the habit of feeling, whenever he stood near the chimney-piece, was stolen. The robbery must have been accomplished in the dusk, during the very few minutes that Mr. Marston was left alone. Olivia had gone to her room; Fritz was called into the kitchen, on some culinary consultation with Mrs. Flaherty. The thief, adroitly watching his opportunity, it would seem, had quietly opened the door, and without waking the blind man in his arm-chair by the fire, had walked off with the most valuable thing he could lay hands on.

The loss was discovered within a quarter of an hour of the robbery. Olivia was greatly distressed. She knew how highly her father valued this clock, and how he would miss it. Of the little that had been saved from the wreck of their fortunes, this had been the first thing to be laid aside. He was not so deaf but that he could still hear it strike the quarters, and no other time was ever right for him but what this particular clock told. She never saw him go near the fire without his passing a hand over the case. It was something more than an inanimate object; it was a constant and a speaking companion to the blind man, sacred as having belonged to her, and bound up with endless memories of the past, that were hidden away from every mortal eye.

Olivia had a rapid consultation with Fritz, and to them was quickly joined Mrs. Flaherty. Who could it be? How could he or she have got into the house?

The police? Yes, but first search the house. Might not the thief be concealed here still?

Rumour, wearing the shape of the maid of all work, flew up three pair of stairs, and bounced into Mrs. Crosbie's room with the intelligence.

Down rushes Mrs. Elliston, gushing over with sympathy, but more acute, in spite of her infantile garrulity, than any of them:

"The shaggy black man, Miss Marston! the model! The man who made you open the door!"

CHAPTER XVII.

Mr. Thompson.

MR. THOMPSON had been gone some time. His door was locked. Where to find him? How to learn the address of that ill-looking model who certainly had been seen to enter the house — the maid now remembered that she had let him in — early in the afternoon? The police were communicated with; they came and examined the premises, and listened to a statement of the case. The thief — supposing him to be the man in question — had no doubt concealed himself under the stairs, after leaving Mr. Thompson, and watched his opportunity to enter the Marstons' rooms unperceived. Again the question, where was this Mr. Thompson? was asked with some impatience by the police. It seemed scarcely credible that Mrs. Flaherty did not know where to find him; and when she further stated that his visits were quite uncertain, and that very probably he might not come to his lodging at all to-morrow, the chief policeman, by his manner, seemed really to suspect that this strange lodger himself might be implicated in the robbery. At all events, the only clue to the discovery of the Italian model was wanting; for the present nothing could be done but to institute an inquiry after such a looking man, and to send round to all the pawnbrokers, warning them to give information if the missing property reached their hands.

The evening was a mild one; yet Olivia made up a fire enough to roast an ox. Even Mr. Marston, who was generally so chilly, felt oppressed by it, and her end, for the moment, was answered. He drew his chair rather further from the chimney-piece, and did not once get up to raise his coat-tails, and warm his back. The evil hour might be only deferred, but at least the old man would sleep to-night, without the agitation which the discovery of his loss would have caused. She herself passed an anxious evening and a restless night. If she could only keep the knowledge of this from him until some clue to the missing clock was traced!

She was up by daybreak — up and watching at the window, the baker, the milk-woman, the post-man, the few stragglers, even to a vagrant dog, who came along the sloppy pavement at that early hour looking wistfully down all the area railings in search of a bone. No policeman, no Mr. Thompson, and the breakfast hour stealthily creeping on.

She went down-stairs. She sat sick at heart by the window. Fritz came in; he had been already with the police that morning. No clue to the suspected man; no tidings of the clock. Olivia sent her breakfast away untouched. She dared not alarm her father by going into his room; he hated anything unusual. As the clock struck ten he came in, leaning on Fritz's arm.

"Very foggy; very dark. Will you be good enough to write my journal, Olivia?"

"Yes, father."

"Does the fog get into your head, eh? Make you feel stupid? forget everything?" He is feeling the mantelpiece as he speaks.

Olivia bites her lip hard; the moment, she knows, has come.

"Where — where is the clock?"

He turned his sightless eyes towards her as he spoke, while his trembling hand still fumbled at the chimney-shelf.

She had found it quite impossible beforehand to frame any words wherewith to break the loss to him. The Father of Lies now urged her strongly to say that the clock was gone to be cleaned; but she resisted the temptation. With the courage of desperation, she blurted out at last —

"Some one has taken it; but we shall get it back, papa, to-day, I hope. We know — we are nearly sure who it is, and ——"

"Taken — taken!" he almost shouted. "What do you mean, child? My clock stolen? What are you talking about, eh? Got into the house! Who did it? — who? Oh, my God! Her clock — her clock!"

He became inarticulate with agitation. Fritz almost forced his master down into his chair, and Olivia knelt at his feet taking his hand in hers, and pouring out such soothing words as her heart prompted her at the moment to speak. But the old man's excitement rendered him impatient of any caress. He pushed away her hand and kept plucking at the arm of the chair, while he moaned and muttered, "Her clock — robbed — stolen — the villain — who is he? How did he get into the house? Ain't there bars to the windows? Do you see that the chain is put up at night? Her clock! Haven't you a house-dog? And the plate — have you seen that all the plate is safe? Terrible — terrible! Her clock; the only clock in the house that went properly. Cost forty-five guineas at Geneva in the year '30, and never lost a minute in the year. Her clock, too—ta—ta—ta! What are we to do now, eh? Send for the police? Let 'em search the coal-cellar and every hole and corner, Olivia. Offer 'em a—a—well—a handsome reward, do you hear? I must have the clock back, I must."

Olivia caught sight of a head she recognised passing the window at that moment. She ran into the passage as Mr. Thompson opened the hall-door with his latch-key and entered.

"Sir," said Olivia impetuously, "we have been robbed; robbed of a clock which is of great value to my father, and we have every reason to think that a model of yours, a tall, dark Italian, is the person who has taken it. Can you give us his address?" Her cheek was flushed with excitement; her eyes looked full into the painter's face as she spoke. No wonder he seemed taken aback by the unexpectedness and the manner of the assault.

"By all means," at last he replied, slowly. "But may I ask your reasons for suspecting this man, Miss Marston? He is a great scamp, I dare say, and not unlikely to be the culprit. I shall do all in my power to find him, but it is better I should know what ground you have for suspecting the fellow."

"Firstly, that he knocked at our door some days ago under the pretence of asking for you, though, it appears, he has been constantly in your rooms. I observed that he looked round ours curiously, and from where he stood he could see the clock. Then, it seems, he came to you early yesterday afternoon, but the maid says that she heard the street-door shut gently towards dusk, and, looking out, she is nearly sure she saw this man walking away."

"Humph. This is somewhat of my affair, Miss Marston. I consider myself responsible that — that — no pains is spared to get back your property, and I have little doubt of succeeding. He certainly left me while it was yet full daylight. Be good enough to describe this clock minutely; the maker, and number too, if you can."

"The maker was Grohe. I am not aware that there was any number on it, but my mother's initials, L. O. M., with the date, July, 1830, were engraved on the back." She then described the size and appearance of the case generally, which was similar to that of thousands still fabricated yearly. Mr. Thompson at once saw that, except for the initials, it would be impossible to identify this clock from any other such by the same maker.

"My father is very much excited about this loss," said Olivia. "It would be a comfort, perhaps, if you would speak to him for a moment, Mr. Thompson, and tell him you think the clock will be recovered."

He followed her into the parlour, where Fritz was assuring his master energetically that it was impossible the clock could be stolen — “voyons, m’sieu, c’t juste imbossible.”

“Il ne faut pas congredire la raison, Fritz. Ong me l’a volé,” repeated the old gentleman angrily.

“Here is Mr. Thompson, papa,” began Olivia.

“And who is Mr. Thompson, eh? What has he got to do with my clock, Olivia? Is this a moment for visits, when my clock is stolen? What are all the Mr. Thompsons in the world ——”

“Stay, my good sir. I’m not the man who stole your clock, but I am the next thing to it; I brought in the man who probably did, and I shall not rest until I find him, and your clock too. Make your mind easy.”

Olivia saw herself now in a fresh dilemma. How to explain to her father this Mr. Thompson’s presence and business at all in the house? She had forgotten that. The blind man looked bewildered, but his angry excitement had now an object to vent itself upon. He took up his visitor’s words:

“It’s easy to say ‘easy,’ sir. God bless my soul! Brought a man into the house. And by what right, sir? what do you mean? Introducing a set of ragamuffins to cut people’s throats and — and steal clocks in this way? Pray who are you, and by what right ——”

Olivia’s eyes had already implored Mr. Thompson’s forbearance, and half explained the truth to him. The kindly, pitying look in the painter’s eyes, as he bent them on the blind man, reassured his daughter. She now interrupted her father, apprehensive of what he might say next.

“Mr. Thompson has a room in this house, father.

The person we suspect is a model he has been painting. I will explain it all to you afterwards."

But the old man's mind had already wandered back to its original grievance.

"Robbed. Her clock stolen; terrible — terrible! What am I to do, eh? It all comes of keeping the room so dark; scarcely feel the way to one's mouth. The confounded rascal must have taken it under my very nose. Where are the police? What are the police about, that they let thieves escape in this way?"

"The police are on the man's traces," said Mr. Thompson, "and before the evening we shall have both him and the clock; you may depend upon that, sir."

Mr. Marston listened like one in a dream. He had already forgotten who the speaker was; yet had a dim recollection that he had been told, and so leant back in his chair, muttering and moaning to himself, while Mr. Thompson left the room, followed by Olivia.

"You will forgive him, sir, I am sure," she said, "when I explain to you that he is quite blind, though he believes, or tries to make us believe, that he still sees. And he had paralysis just before his — before we came here, so we have never told him that this is a lodging. He can ill stand any shock now. That is why I am so anxious about this clock. I must explain your presence in this house as best I can to him, and you will come and tell us the result of your inquiries as soon as possible, won't you?"

"A quarter to eleven," he replied, looking at his watch. "I will send to you, or be here again, at two. And by that time you shall know what chance we have of success. Give your father something to make him sleep during the day, and before night ——”

He left the sentence unfinished, for his hand was upon the street-door as he spoke, and he passed out quickly, closing it behind him.

“That should be an honest girl; or am I again deceived, and is she like the rest of them?” muttered the painter, as he hurried along. “It looks a crystal nature, only that I have been taught, by bitter experience, to mistrust my discrimination in women. But what a head! I should like to paint it. The expression is even finer than I thought, until to-day, though I have watched her often, these months past, and have felt curious as to the girl herself. Yet, true to my plan of life, I avoided trying to find the answer to this riddle myself. Fate wills it that we are to become acquainted. So be it. We shall see if, in the long run, she prove to be all she looks. She can have no motive for playing a part to me — a poor painter, a middle-aged misanthrope;” and he smiled, more in sadness than bitterness, as the thought crossed his mind.

On the other hand, the painter's promptitude and decision in action had greatly reassured Olivia. His accent and way of speaking showed her at once that she had not been mistaken, that he was a man of education, and that, whatever the accidents of his worldly position, he was, in the true sense of the word, a gentleman. She was glad now that she had spoken to him herself, instead of sending a message by Fritz. There was something so kind in his manner, that she felt at her ease — almost on friendly terms — with him at once. So quickly, in those few minutes, had the barrier of five months been swept away!

In the mean time, this is what the painter did. Having told the police all he knew touching the Italian, he hunted out a colony of models, organ-grinders, and Savoyards, living in the purlieus of Saffron-hill. The information gained here, after some difficulty, was unsatisfactory enough. The man in question was supposed to have gone to Paris in company with a band of pifferari. Nothing could be heard of the clock. It had not been seen by any of his companions; it almost certainly had not been disposed of before he left. Except the fact of the man's decamping, there was no circumstance elicited tending to throw the least additional suspicion on the model. After nearly two hours of fruitless inquiry, Mr. Thompson left the matter in the hands of the police, threw himself into a hansom, and told the man to drive him to Wigmore-street. At Grohe's door he got out.

There was a customer in the shop; he waited till this person was gone, then he asked to speak to the principal or foreman of the establishment.

"In the year 1830 a clock was bought from your house in Geneva," he began, and went on to describe the one stolen. "I am told it cost forty-five pounds. Do you know, or can you find out, the exact kind of clock you sold at that time for this price?"

"From what you say, sir, it must have been similar to this. This has the same movement you describe, and the same sort of travelling-case."

The clock which was shown to Mr. Thompson corresponded in every particular with the description given by Olivia. One thing only was wanting.

"Engrave these letters for me here, on the back, do you see? Let it be done by six o'clock. I shall call for it at that hour, punctually. And get rid of that spic-and-span look: dull the ormolu a little." Then he went his way.

At two o'clock a line was brought to Olivia.

"You will have the clock this evening. Thief not turned up yet."

A sedative, surreptitiously administered, had made Mr. Marston sleep the greater part of the day. It was near seven o'clock when Mr. Thompson came, bringing the clock. Olivia ran up to him, with her face beaming.

"Where did you find it? Oh, how glad I am! And the wretched man, is he taken yet? I almost hope not. It is very weak, but I shall so hate any trial about it."

"There will be no trial, I think I may assure you. The man has certainly left England; that is clear. The clock I got, without any difficulty, from the shop where I found it."

"Well, it certainly has received no damage externally during its escapade of twenty-four hours," said Olivia; "for it looks to me positively newer and brighter than it did yesterday."

"Probably cleaned and furbished up in the shop. Ah! your father is waking. Put the clock on his knee and let him feel it."

"Very dark," muttered Mr. Marston. "One feels quite confused; the fog gets into one's head, or something. Doesn't know where one is when one first wakes. Eh, what's this? The clock on my knee! What's the folly of putting it there? The mantel-shelf is the proper place for — Stay, I am losing my head, or I dreamt — I dreamt it was stolen, Olivia. Tell me if I was dreaming, child?"

"No, dear father, the clock was taken; you did not dream it; but you see it has come back quite safe, thanks to Mr. Thompson's kind exertions; and it has been cleaned, and looks so nice."

"Cleaned! It didn't want cleaning, and now there will be a bill to pay for that, and something for getting it back, I suppose. And have you caught the thief, sir? Make an example of him, sir. We'll prosecute him. I'll go into court myself. (What's that you're whispering, Olivia? — telling me to thank Mr. Johnson?) I wish I could see you better, sir, but the room is so confoundedly dark. I am greatly indebted to you for getting this clock back; but as I understand that, owing to some odd arrangement, you have a room in my house, I hope you won't let any more of these foreign ruffians in — that's all. (He won't expect to be asked to dinner, will he?)"

The sentences in brackets were delivered in two very audible asides to Olivia, who knelt beside him, holding the clock on his knee. She looked up, with flushing cheeks, at their visitor, on whose lip was the faintest possible smile.

"You need have no apprehensions, Mr. Marston, from any more of my models. If I want one again, I will bring him into the house, and see him out of it. And as to this thief, we shall find him, sooner or later, and punish him, without your appearing in court; I have little doubt of that. He will be hanging about Rome, or Florence, or Paris, when I go there. That sort of vagabond never turns to a life of hard work in his mountains again."

"The ends of justice will hardly be answered by that — eh?" said the old man, with a quiet sarcasm. "And as to foreign police — they're no good."

"Then I shall be my own policeman (if I catch him)," said the painter, smiling; "as I was once, at Toledo."

"Eh? How was that? At Toledo? God bless my soul!" said Mr. Marston, with great animation, "and how came that about, sir? Who was the man?"

"A servant of mine, who had run away from me three years before, at Athens, carrying off a hundred pounds I had just got at the bank. No use pursuing him — I knew I should fall in with the rascal again some day. It was the night I was leaving Toledo — I was in the cathedral, listening to the vespers — I suddenly perceived my old friend Giuseppe in suspicious proximity to the pocket of an old lady. I had no time to spare, or I might have amused myself by watching his proceedings. I went up to him — you should have seen the beggar's face. He made a futile pretence of not recognising me. I told him, if he did not follow me out instantly, I would have him arrested for attempting to pick pockets. It would have been inconvenient to me to have given him up to the police for this, or for his robbing me (even supposing that they would have paid much attention to me, which I doubt). I should, at all events, have lost my place in the diligence, and have been detained there some days; so I took the law into my own hands, as being the quickest and easiest course. I led him round to the back of the cathedral, and I thrashed him, until I was ashamed to punish the abject brute any more."

"Ah! very interesting, Mr. Johnson. Satisfactory, that. Terrible thing, a dishonest servant — terrible! Cut your throat before you know where you are — like Lord What's-his-name? No security when you lie down at night! Lucky thing for you, sir, that you left Toledo at once. I know those Spanish and Italian fellows — you'd have had a stiletto in you, as sure as your name is Johnson."

"Thompson, father."

"Very well, Thompson, then. And so you've been a great traveller, sir? — painting as you go along, I suppose; a knapsack on your back — eh? Well, I once travelled like that, when I was five-and-twenty. Then afterwards, when I had a family, we went about in a coach; and fine work I had to make them grease the wheels, and oil the leathers, and clean it all properly at night. I've stood over them for hours; but there isn't a foreigner who knows anything about a carriage — or a horse either, for that matter."

"Quite right there, sir," said the painter, who began to understand the old gentleman, and found a good deal of quiet amusement in humouring him — "quite right. It requires to keep a sharp look-out in such cases."

"You may say that, indeed! Very unpleasant things happened — very unpleasant, several times. I found the linchpin out of one of the wheels once, just as we were starting. Why, sir, we might all have been rolled into the Arno, and the coach atop of us; we couldn't have swum out. And once I found a fellow coiled up with the drag, underneath the carriage, smothered in dust, but smoking his pipe, and letting us pull him up-hill, as coolly! . . . He probably was a robber, who was waiting his opportunity to attack us; but I presented my loaded pistol at him, and he took to his heels across the woods in double-quick time."

He leant back in his chair; Olivia had not seen him so talkative, so like his old self, for months. He certainly was the better for a visitor who would fall into his vein, and tell him of personal experiences that aroused his peculiar turn of interest. Mr. Thompson sat there, very good-naturedly, as Olivia said to herself, for nearly half an hour, relating such anecdotes as his tact showed him were likely to be relished by the blind man. And the clock was forgotten. As he got up to go away, Olivia suddenly exclaimed:

"You must have paid to recover this clock, I am sure?"

"Nothing, Miss Marston."

"My father, being practical, thought of this. I confess I did not, till he suggested it. You will come and see him again, Mr. Thompson? It will be kind of you — now that the ice is broken, and that the thought of a strange visitor will not startle him. Your stories have amused him so much, I know. He will talk about them all the evening. Thank you so much for all your trouble."

The old man wished him good night quite cordially.

"Rather an amusing man, that Mr. Jackson," he said, when his visitor was gone. He never committed himself to extravagant praise of any thing or body. Yet he talked of little else till he went to bed; asking questions about him which Olivia was quite unable to answer, and commenting upon the stories he had heard.

As Olivia replaced the clock upon the mantelpiece, her eye was attracted by the inscription at the back.

"It is strange," she said to herself, "I have not looked at it for a long time; but my impression — my strong impression — was, that the letters were Roman, small Roman letters, and this writing is in running characters. I can't make it out. The case, too — it is very strange;" and she fell to pondering, without being able to arrive at any satisfactory solution of the difficulty.

CHAPTER XVIII.

In which Two People speak ill of each other.

FROM that day forwards, the painter was constantly dropping in for half an hour to chat with Mr. Marston, in the twilight. Sometimes two or three days elapsed, as heretofore, without his coming to his chambers; but, upon the whole, he was more regular in his appearance there; and, when there, he almost always asked if Mr. Marston would like to see him, before he left the house. The old man grew very soon to look for these visits, as the most amusing part of his day, and to feel himself aggrieved when three whole days went by without his hearing the sound of the painter's voice. It was a pleasant one, certainly, and his manner of recounting was good. He had travelled much, and seen much of his fellow-men; that was clear. From whatever source he drew his daily supply of anecdote, whether from his own imagination or from old books (for he was evidently a great reader), the art of pouring it out, like beer, not flat and spiritless, but with a head on, was great. Olivia was as much delighted to listen as her father. How often, in after-years, she looked back to those hours, when a happiness was growing up silently and unobserved in her, day by day, and when, without a thought of the future, she let herself drift upon the sunny tranquil waters of the present, ignorant of whither they were bearing her!

Here is an extract from one of her letters to Rupert, in which, after telling him of the robbery, she went on to speak of Mr. Thompson:

"He is a very singular person. He gives me the impression of a life wasted by some great sorrow: I fancy he bears the stamp of it in his face. Not that he is sentimental or melancholy; on the contrary, he is at times very humorous, and his conversation with father is always amusing — only occasionally rather cynical, which I dislike. But he has strong and deep feelings, I am sure, under that grave, calm exterior; and in his satirical talk I often detect an under-current of passionate sadness. Father has taken an amusing fancy to him, and, now that De Castro and Montalba are away, his visits are most pleasant and wholesome diversions for him, from the monotony of my very small talk. Of Mr. Thompson's past (or, indeed, present) history no one in this house knows anything. In spite of his old coat, he must be tolerably well off, from certain small indications, which a woman, of course, is sure to observe; and if painting be really his profession, he is certainly independent of it."

Not many evenings after the robbery, Mr. Thompson encountered Mrs. Elliston, for the first time, at the Marstons'. He did not look surprised, for he was a man who seldom showed what was passing within; but he listened to the little lady with a certain scrutiny, unmixed with the smallest pleasure or admiration. So, at least, it appeared to Olivia; and from an artistic point of view, at least, she had expected that Mr. Thompson must admire her pretty friend. The attention he paid Mrs. Elliston was that of a naturalist to the insect he wishes to dissect. He talked very much less when she was present; listened, and watched; and, like a skilful counsel, put an adroit question now and then, which "drew out" something he wanted. But Mrs. Elliston writhed under this process, for she was sharp enough to see what he was about; and she resented at once the obtuseness to her charms and the cold analysis of her character.

"How you can stand that man sitting there and saying nothing, but smiling every now and then with those washed-out eyes of his, Miss Marston, I can't think! Such manners as he has, too, I never saw! I like artists in general so much, but this one really is too great a boor. It's very good of you to tolerate him — for your father's sake."

"There is no goodness in it, I assure you. For my own sake, I am extremely obliged to him for coming. I find his visits pleasant and amusing. Only when you come in, I think he likes hearing you talk better than talking himself."

"I am very much obliged to him; but I don't like a man who never says a word, but glares at one, and listens to all one says. He has one at such a disadvantage: and then he puts questions too; in fact, it is the only time he ever opens his lips. I wonder what he would do if I were to put questions to him."

"Probably, not answer them," laughed Olivia.

"Well, there are one or two that I should like to put to him, and if I meet him very often I think I shall. Is he married or single? to begin with. Then, how is it that no one knows where he lives?"

"It is not at all uncommon for artists to have studios away from their own homes, and I don't know why any of us should be particularly told where his is, and whether he is married or single. It is no business of ours. He comes to see my father out of pure charity; and to him we are utter strangers, of whose past he knows as little as we do of his."

"He knows of your present, however," said Mrs. Elliston, quickly.

"Not more than I do of yours," replied Olivia, looking into the widow's face.

She coloured, and the tears came into her eyes.

"Never mind," said Olivia, kindly, taking her hand. "Do not think I want to force any confidence from you — only allow other people to have their secrets, too. We none of us can ever know really much about each other in this life, I think. 'We see as in a glass darkly,' as St. Paul says. All the secret difficulties each of us has to encounter can never be known now."

"Ah! you are so charitable; so pure-minded! Dear Olivia!" burst forth Mrs. Elliston, seizing her hands. "May I call you so? and will you call me Clara? I have no friend in the world but you; and I do cling to you so much — ah! you don't know! Oh, don't let that man prejudice you against me. I know he hates me. I know he does. Don't listen to him, if he abuses me."

"Abuses you? Nonsense, Mrs. Elliston; he —"

"Please, call me Clara."

"Well, Clara, then; Mr. Thompson is a thorough gentleman. He would not think of abusing a lady, whom he has never met but in our drawing-room."

"Ah! that is just it. I don't know. I am not sure that he may not have met me before; and because I'm a poor singer, who am obliged to earn my bread, he may think fit to say all sorts of things about me. Men are so ungenerous."

"Not this one, I think," said Olivia. "But if I am to talk to you as a friend, let me say this. You fancy Mr. Thompson has conceived a prejudice against you? If what you said the other day be true, I am not surprised. You behave more like a giddy child than a staid widow, dropping your things on the stairs, singing at the top of your voice, peeping in at his room-door — in short, to speak plainly, trying to attract his attention by every sort of device. I believe you do it out of pure gaiety of heart; but it is excessively foolish, and calculated to give the very worst impression of you to any stranger. A man of Mr. Thompson's age has possibly very little toleration for such frolics."

The tears came again into the little widow's eyes.

"I'm sure I don't care how little he tolerates them, provided he doesn't turn you against me. But you're right, dear, I know you are; and I'm a foolish little creature — only I really think Aunt Crosbie makes me worse by saying everything I do is wicked; and I'm sure, with the dull life I lead —"

"Dull? Why, you have all the excitement of the theatre. I consider your life very dissipated, on the contrary, though I'm afraid not a happy one. This feverish restlessness, I suppose, belongs to your career; but you can never have any time for reflection, Clara; and living in a perpetual whirl, no one can be happy, it seems to me. During the few quiet hours of the day you are occasionally at home, do you ever sit down and think seriously of this life, which is gliding away, like water through your fingers?"

Clara Elliston's head was turned aside. She shook it silently.

"I never think," she said, at last, and in so altered a voice that Olivia started. "If I did, I should go mad. My only happiness in the past is mingled with bitterness: I can only live in the present."

"And the future? You are still very young: you have a long and probably a difficult life before you. Whatever is past, is past; whatever is to come you have the power of shaping, in some sense, for 'conduct is fate;' but by drowning thought, and living from excitement to excitement, you are preparing yourself ill to meet sorrows, and trials, and disappointments."

"I cannot help it. I am so constituted, that if I have not something to rouse and interest me, I am miserable. You don't know me; perhaps you will, some day. I am a wretched creature — full of faults and follies, dear; but I am to be pitied — I am, indeed: if you knew all, you would say so."

She cried; and then she dried her eyes; and five minutes afterwards she was mimicking her Aunt Crosbie, and laughing in that bewitching childish way of hers, which Olivia could seldom resist, though she often disapproved.

I think it probable that had Mr. Thompson shown himself the least attracted by Clara Elliston's pretty wiles, Olivia would have been less indulgent to her than she was. But she came to the conclusion, after watching them together upon three or four occasions, that the painter was hard upon the poor little widow. And, after that, she sought an opportunity of speaking to him about her. And this trait was very characteristic of Olivia. There were things she disliked, and much that she could not understand about her new friend (as she must now call her), but her chivalry made her desire to break a lance in her behalf. Had Mr. Thompson admired Mrs. Elliston, of course this would not have been necessary. But Mr. Thompson did, clearly, not admire her; therefore Olivia spoke.

O. Have you ever seen Mrs. Elliston on the stage, Mr. Thompson?

Mr. T. Never.

O. Nor heard her sing?

Mr. T. I cannot say that; for it is difficult to be in the same house an hour with her, and not hear her; but I was never in the same room. I suppose it is what you call "a fine voice"?

O. What I call! Why, surely there can't be a doubt about it? It is a voice of rare power and beauty, and her singing improves every day.

Mr. T. Does it? I think she sings louder every day, which is no doubt the test.

O. I would give a good deal to see her act. I am sure she must act so well.

Mr. T. I have little doubt of it — such constant practice.

O. I see, by the expression of your face, what you mean, Mr. Thompson. You are prejudiced against her, I think. She is so very thoughtless and giddy — so like a child. Who do you smile? I know her conduct is often foolish, perhaps even reprehensible; but she is of an excitable temperament, and then she has evidently never had much education — of course, I mean of the higher sort — and therefore great allowances are to be made for her.

Mr. T. Oh, if you go back to first causes, I have nothing to say, Miss Marston. No doubt you are right. Great allowances ought to be made, I think, for the man at the gallows, inasmuch as his early training was not what it might have been.

O. But there is real good in Mrs. Elliston, let me tell you, in spite of her little surface follies. I know one or two poor people about here, to whom she has been very kind. Then there is no end to her little thoughtful attentions to my father and to me. If she has had any flowers at the theatre, she is always sure to send me half; and the same with fruit, books, newspapers, that she thinks may amuse my father.

Mr. T. How does she get all these luxuries? Living in a garret, with that most repulsive old lady upstairs, is it not somewhat strange that she should be so supplied?

O. She has not the least idea of the value of money, and is very extravagant. I often lecture her; but she always assures me that these things are sent her by different friends — and of course I have nothing to say.

Mr. T. (dryly). I think a great deal might be said on that subject. But you know Mrs. Elliston better than I do — you are her friend.

O. Yes; I am her friend.

Mr. T. So I shall try and correct any false impression I may have taken of her. I have a mind to go and see her act to-night. Some suburban theatre, is it not?

O. Yes, the St. Vincent. Her engagement there ends this week, and she hopes to get one at this end of the town; but it is very uncertain. If she had but the money, she ought to go to Italy, and study there.

Mr. T. And you are teaching her Italian, meantime? You are an uncommon young lady, Miss Mars-ton, to take all this trouble, and to defend as you have been doing as thorough-paced a little coquette as ———

O. I thought you were going to correct your false impressions? And you evidently know my sex very little, if you think it strange that I should be good-natured towards another woman, or defend her when I think her unjustly attacked.

Mr. T. Allow me to remark, en passant, that I never attacked at all. You came into the lists, and offered to do battle in behalf of your fair friend. As to my knowledge of your sex, this is what experience has taught me: that it is divided into two classes, the intensely virtuous, who have such a keen nose for vice that they smell it a mile off; and the utterly careless in such matters, who are too much absorbed in themselves and their own affairs (here he frowned) to think of attacking their neighbours — unless their neighbours interfere with them. These are not the women who would give up some hours every week to teaching one of their own sex, more especially if she were young and pretty, with every disposition to make the most of these advantages. You see, you put my calculations out: I can't class you under either head.

O. Are not all classifications mistakes? We vary as the leaves do on a tree. It is evident, however, that your ideas of women are based upon most unfortunate experiences, since you think they can be classed broadly under "the careless" and "the uncharitable." Owing to circumstances, I have been brought up more with men than women. Of the latter I know, indeed, very few; yet I know enough to belie your judgment.

Mr. T. You are right: my experience has been unfortunate, Miss Marston.

She felt sorry that she had said it; there was an expression in the painter's face she had never seen before. Perhaps he had an unhappy home? She would give something to know if he were married. After a moment, with a sigh of weariness, he continued:

Blessed is he that profiteth by his experience.

O. Not if his experience makes him sceptical of good. I have a brother, whom I dearly love; and his admiration, his faith, in women generally is so great, that it is difficult to make him think ill of one. Yet I wouldn't have him otherwise. He has seen a good deal of the world for so young a man, but he is as fresh as a boy, and when he marries ——

Mr. T. If you love him, pray devoutly that he never may. That sort of fellow is sure to be taken in.

O. Oh, he certainly will marry. He is so domestic — so fond of children. He never could go through life as a bachelor: a solitary old age for a man — it must be miserable. It is different for a woman.

Mr. T. Here again my experience comes in. My old age will, in all human probability, be a solitary one; and I am very, very glad of it. It might have been otherwise.

O. You are not, then —— I thought you were married, Mr. Thompson.

Mr. T. I was, Miss Marston. It pleased a merciful Providence to make me a widower.

Olivia was somewhat shocked at the levity of the painter's tone, and the bitter smile that accompanied it. There followed a pause, which she broke at last.

O. And you have no children — no home ties?

Mr. T. None. My art is now wife, and child, and everything to me. She is but a fickle mistress, if you divide your affection between her and others. All artists should be single — all creators of any kind — unless the wife is content to occupy a secondary place.

O. (ruminating). Let us see — there is Shakespeare —

Mr. T. Shakespeare never wrote after he settled down at Stratford, and became a family man. Dante, Petrarch, take whom you will — musicians, painters, poets — they are either unmarried, or their married lives are miserable.

O. Clearly it is not the wives' fault, then. It is hard that our sex should be made responsible for this.

Mr. T. I do not hold them so. I say that the exercise of the imagination — and the larger and loftier that imagination is, the more self-absorbing — unfits men for married life. All the nourishment that should go to the heart goes to the brain. They are irritable, capricious, moody — seldom pleasant husbands for the fireside; often led by their fancy to seek for companionship beyond it.

There was another pause; Olivia scarcely knew what to say.

O. And every year you find your profession more engrossing? How long have you been an artist?

Mr. T. I have only worked seriously within the last five years. I always drew, but it was only when losses — circumstances, in short — made me retire from the world, that I found Nature was my best friend, and my brush and palette my most trustworthy servants. I never tire of Nature. Books sometimes bore me; pictures often; people almost always; Nature never. I go out upon Hampstead Heath, and I find her as beautiful in her garb there as I do upon the Campagna. I travel abroad, but what is it for? Not for the galleries; not for the ruins of antiquity: it is for the varying aspects of Nature. She alone never disappoints me, though Velasquez and Leonardo often do. She, I find, always repays me, whether I wander on the lonely summits of the Apennines or the sunny plains of Provence, Styria, Switzerland, Spain — she greets me everywhere. Do you remember what Wordsworth says? —

. . . . that Nature never did betray
The heart that loved her: 't is her privilege,
Through all the years of this our life, to lead
From joy to joy: for she can so inform
The mind that is within us, so impress
With quietness and beauty, and so feed
With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues,
Rash judgments, nor the sneers of selfish men,
Nor greetings where no kindness is, nor all
The dreary intercourse of daily life,
Shall e'er prevail against us.

Mr. Marston, who had been dozing, here started up, and called for Olivia.

The tête-à-tête was broken up for that evening.

CHAPTER XIX.

Skirmishing.

MISS MARSTON found herself pondering over the painter's words, and wondering what his past history was, more persistently that night than she would have cared to admit. He called in the next morning on his way up to his work.

"I went to see your friend last night. She hasn't a face for the stage: it is all too small — eyes and everything; but she acts with tremendous fire, and has wonderful lungs for such a little woman. She made startling plunges with her voice, and fished up a deep note, every now and then, Heaven knows where from! And then she went up like the last string of a fiddle — squeak, squeak, until the excruciating sound was lost in the cavities of the brain. It was a more extraordinary than pleasing exercise. Like watching a tumbler, one was painfully curious to know how she would ever get her voice down again, after screwing it up so high into her head."

"What's that you're talking about? The fog that's got into your head?" inquired Mr. Marston, leaning forward, with his hand up to his ear, to catch what he heard but imperfectly. "Did you say you'd been watching a tumbler? Tumbling is a very dangerous exercise, particularly in this dark, slippery weather. I remember seeing a man in Seville once, in the streets. He had a terrible fall — terrible: knocked out all his front teeth."

"Ah, sir, that was nothing to six brothers whom

I saw in the arena at Nismes, performing a triumphal pyramid upon each other's heads. The fundamental base of this erection slipped, or caught his foot — down they all came! Three of them went up with Roman noses, which were flattened like pugs."

"You don't say so? Three Roman noses! Terrible, terrible, indeed! — ta — ta — ta. Have you heard of many accidents in the streets lately? You don't take the horses out this dark weather, I hope, Olivia?"

The painter looked at Miss Marston.

"No, father, we never take them out now;" and turning to Thompson, she added, in a lower voice, "Do you wonder very much at my constant power of dissimulation? It is so easy, poor darling! to deceive him, and it saves him such a world of misery! indeed, I don't think he would survive the shock. Nothing else could make me carry on this sham of being something we no longer are."

"I am not of those who will think less of your truthfulness on that account," he said, with a friendly smile.

"Do you sell your pictures very dear? — make much money by 'em?" asked Mr. Marston by-and-by, suddenly.

"I can't say that I do," replied the painter, with perfect good humour. "You see, my style is the great historic, which isn't very marketable in England."

"Bad investment, that. You'd better change your style, then. No family to support, I suppose — eh?"

"None, sir, thank Heaven."

"Ah! that's lucky; better be in a house of business, though. I shouldn't wonder if my son were a partner in Claxton's house, some day; getting on famously — that's the sort of art that pays best — those are the sort of figures that return a man interest for his time; he draws them to some purpose — eh, sir?" and the old gentleman was mightily pleased at his own joke.

"I should make but a poor man of business," replied Thompson; but I have more than enough for all my wants, and, for the rest, I am very indifferent about money. You see, sir, I have no one to make, or to save for; and I have no sympathy with the man who 'heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them.'"

"Tut — tut — why, you're a young man still, eh? I don't see very clear, but so I imagine. You may marry yet, and have a family."

"You are mistaken, sir; I am hard upon forty; and led a married life of such supreme bliss for eighteen years that I am not likely to try and renew it."

Mr. Marston pondered on the sarcasm of the painter's words; his brow knit, his sightless eyes fixed on the wall opposite, and his lips parted, as was his wont when trying to solve some mental puzzle.

Olivia sat steadily stitching, without looking up. She wished he would say something more; she felt the most intense curiosity about his married life, but, somehow or other, she would not have shown this for the world.

The awkward silence was broken by Clara Elliston, who, with a preliminary knock, tripped into the room just then, kissed Olivia, bowed frigidly to Mr. Thompson, and went up to the blind man, announcing her presence by putting her little hand in his, and wishing him "good morning."

O. We have been talking of you, Clara. Mr. Thompson went to see you in the "Sonnambula" last night, and says you acted with great spirit.

Mrs. E. (smiling blandly). Ah! yes. I think I astonished them in "Do not mingle," with some of the things I did. I was in good voice, and being carried away by my excitement, do you know, I invented all those last roulades on the spot.

Mr. T. Did you? I thought so.

Mrs. E. I was universally complimented, and had three bouquets thrown to me from one box — filled by officers of the Guards, who came all the way from the West-end to hear me. Those are the men who know what singing is — accustomed always to hear the best.

This was said with marked emphasis. She was too sharp not to see that the painter's admiration had been of a very limited character. But I am afraid he was impervious to the sneer. He looked at her complacently, and said,

"I am an old-fashioned man, and not worthy, I am afraid, of the new school of singing."

"Olivia," said Mrs. Elliston, without taking any further notice of Mr. Thompson, "you will be glad to hear that I have at last got two pupils — Alderman Bloom's daughters. I went to see Mrs. Bloom yesterday, and she haggled about terms for a long time; but I wasn't going to take the two for less than seven and sixpence each, and at last she had to give in."

O. Oh! I am so glad.

Mr. T. And you thought Mrs. Elliston did not know the value of money, Miss Marston?

Mrs. E. (still ignoring Mr. Thompson). Mrs. Bloom is such a vulgar woman, my dear! The Alderman was Lord Mayor two or three years ago, and she has never recovered having been "My Lady" for twelve months. Fifty times, I suppose, in the course of my visit, she referred to that brief season of splendour. "When I was Lady Mayoress, I had opportunities of hearing the very best singing," she told me, and then she brought in a string of great names, to dazzle my poor weak brain.

O. That is a truly English kind of vulgarity: foreigners, I think, are seldom guilty of it.

Mr. T. Not in the same way, perhaps; but your mushroom barons and vicomtes make the most of their coronets. They plaster themselves over with them. And the value they attach to their wretched titles has no proportion to the money that they can be bought with.

Mrs. E. Can be bought with?

Here she turned round.

O. Did you not know that? Nothing is commoner.

Mr. T. Mrs. Bloom is just the woman who, if she lived in France, would purchase unto herself a coronet. Being a British female, she is confined to talk of the coronets she knows.

Mrs. E. But who — what kind of people buy titles? It sounds so absurd!

Mr. T. I will tell you. An example occurs to me. I knew a fellow in Picardy — he was nothing more nor less than a dealer in cattle — a very good honest fellow, of a good Picard family, and a true gentleman in his dealings. Well, he had the misfortune to marry. He only lived with his wife a few months; she was a vain, frivolous creature, who was literally consumed by the one idea of becoming a fine lady. She found, with her husband's views, this was impossible. She betook herself to Paris. There, by dint of interest and money, she got the title of count for her husband; and now — as a Comtesse — the summit of her earthly ambition would seem to have been reached. With classic laconism she wrote to her husband "Monsieur, vous êtes un comte." He replied, "Madame, vous êtes une bête." He utterly declined to assume the title with which she had invested him, and, to her indignation and disgust, sent round cards to all their friends, on which was printed, "Monsieur ———, marchand de bestiaux."

Both ladies laughed, and Olivia said she supposed it had not profited the comtesse much in a worldly point of view; for certainly, in England, if such a thing were possible, it would only meet with ridicule.

Mr. T. The comtesse is now one of the great ladies of Paris — not of the imperial circle, if you please — nothing so parvenu, but of the Faubourg St. Germain. So much for perseverance and determination, even in the case of a gibbering fool like this woman. As to England, I think civilised human nature is pretty much the same all the world over. Customs may vary — the rind of the fruit, so to speak — but the core of snobbism is there. We do not purchase titles (though, by the way, may not the coronets bestowed on our rich bankers and large landed proprietors, without the smallest merit of their own, be said to be purchased, in a sense?), but if the system were ever introduced among us, you may be sure it would not be ridiculed, provided only it cost enough. Money sanctifies all in England — renders all possible: it is power.

Mrs. E. There is a horrid old Jew comes behind the scenes at the theatre sometimes. He makes me sick; and yet I see all the women, and men too, crowding round and laughing at his nasty jokes, and paying him such compliments; and they write him such letters! All because he is rich. He wears diamond rings, as big as marbles, upon his dirty fingers; and they say that kings and princes invite him, and that all the great ladies go to his house. You may well say money is power. Heigho!

"That was an honest sigh, at all events," thought Mr. Thompson; "a sigh after the diamond rings, and the loaves and fishes, scattered broadcast by this wealthy Israelite." Olivia sighed too, but he interpreted her sigh differently. Mr. Marston, not hearing what was said, hazarded the novel observation that it was dark — very; and that he wondered whether the lamps were lit in the streets.

Mr. Thompson replied it was dark, and that the papers spoke of an earthquake at Athens.

Mr. M. God bless my soul! You don't say so? An earthquake! Shocking, terrible, indeed! Many people swallowed up? Are there any particulars?

Mr. T. None, sir, as yet. Here comes your servant to take you out for a walk.

Mr. M. A walk? Nonsense! Such a morning as this!

O. Yes, father — just a little turn. You will find it much warmer out than in.

Fritz. Il fait bi'n beau, m'sieu.

Mr. M. Nong; je n'irai pas. Il fait trop obscur.

Fritz. Je fous garantie, m'sieu, qu'il fait beau.

Mr. M. Fritz, il ne faut pas congredire la raison. Ong va se perdre dans ce bouillard.

The battle, fought afresh every morning, lasted some few minutes, but ended, of course, in the defeat of the old gentleman, who was led off a prisoner, to take his exercise on the sunny strip of pavement outside.

As he shuffled out upon Fritz's arm, it struck the three who watched him—but most painfully of all his daughter—that his gait was feebler, and his body more shrunk and bent, than it had ever yet been.

Mr. Thompson wished Olivia good morning, and went up to his work. But his work, apparently, did not prosper. It was the head of a woman, in chalks, to which he applied himself, as soon as he had locked himself into his room, and had exchanged his coat for a painting-blouse, and had lit his pipe, and had brought this head from the corner of the room, where it had been reposing with its face to the wall. He had been at work upon it, without a model, all yesterday, and the day before, and for many days before that again, and had not succeeded in satisfying himself at all. It was a profile, somewhat too sharp in outline, perhaps, but nobly modelled, the putting-on of the head and column-like grandeur of the throat reminding one of an Elgin marble. The pale lustrous eyes, under straight brows of unusual darkness, had given the painter much trouble; but he had caught their character sufficiently to leave no doubt on the mind of any one who had seen the original, for whom the sketch was intended. So this misogynist could paint women, and take pains with them, too. Apparently, it was the institution of matrimony, and not the sex, to which he had an aversion.

"I'm so glad that man's gone, dear," said Mrs. Elliston, throwing herself into an arm-chair. "I never feel at my ease when he is present. I didn't choose to say so before him, but that old Jew has been persecuting me so. I might be covered with his diamonds now, if I chose — the nasty old wretch!"

Olivia turned sharply round, and looked at Clara, with a flaming cheek.

"What do you mean? Surely I must have misunderstood you?"

"Dearest Olivia, is it my fault if I attract men so? I never looked at the horrid old creature. And one of those Guardsmen wrote me a note, too. I returned it unopened — I did, indeed; though nothing could be more gentlemanlike than his manner when he was introduced to me the other night. I wish I was ugly, I do. It's a positive misfortune to be stared at, and followed in the way I am."

"You bring it entirely upon yourself," said Olivia, angrily. "I have no patience with you, Clara. Your aunt is quite right. Look at your dress. You do everything to attract attention, and then you complain. Do you know, if I didn't believe you to be more like a silly child than a woman — a woman actually older than myself — I should give you up. I can't think how you can go on as you do. You put me upon thorns when Mr. Thompson is here."

"He and I are not the least sympathetic, dear, that's it. His is a cold nature: I am too warm and outspoken. I know I say a great many things I oughtn't."

"It isn't only the things you say — you do such strange things."

Mrs. Elliston put her pocket-handkerchief to her eyes.

"That horrid man has been prejudicing you against me — I see he has. Oh, Olivia, if you knew all — if you knew all — if you knew what I have to bear, you wouldn't be hard upon me."

She burst into tears — apparently real passionate tears. Olivia was moved to pity, as she always was when the little widow flung herself upon her friend's mercy. And it ended, as such scenes had ended before, in Clara's contrition and promises of amendment; but in her telling Olivia nothing.

"I wish heartily you were not on the stage," said the latter. "Keep to concerts, and give lessons; then you will be out of the way of this silly flattery, which your foolish little head cannot stand, Clara. It lowers and vulgarises any nature to listen to all this stuff."

"I can't help their talking to me. There isn't one of them I care twopence about."

"That is exactly what I complain of. You ought to marry again. You would be much safer and happier. But what honest man would like to marry a woman whom he sees surrounded as you seem to be, and drinking in all this adulation? I think you are capable of a strong attachment; and how much happier you would be away from all this excitement, with one man you loved and respected, in a quiet home, with children ——"

Mrs. Elliston started up. Her face was very white: she was not thinking of dramatic effects now.

"Don't go on, Olivia — don't talk about children, for God's sake. I can't stand it. There was a time when — I thought such a life — such happiness possible for me; but it is all gone — gone! No, my present life is the only one for me — when one has suffered as I have, to drown thought — that is the only thing!”

She sat down again, and buried her head in her hands. She was silent for some minutes, and Olivia said nothing, thinking it better to leave Clara now to herself. By-and-by the latter rose, dried her eyes, and presently stole a look at the glass, to see that she was not greatly disfigured; then she leant over Olivia, in a graceful attitude, and kissed her friend's forehead.

“How good you are to me! I'm afraid I don't deserve it. And yet I went to church twice last Sunday, and read a book of Aunt Crosbie's in the evening, upon ‘Justification by Faith.’ Do you hold that doctrine, dear? It is certainly much easier than ‘good works;’ so I think I believe in it.”

CHAPTER XX.

How the News was received in Jamaica.

THERE was a visible change in Mr. Marston from about this time. He daily got feebler, and his appetite failed him. He still, when the sun shone, crawled out upon Fritz's arm for a quarter of an hour; but he became more and more reluctant to leave his arm-chair, where he dozed the greater part of the day. His old Spanish friends, De Castro and Montalba, were still out of England. Mr. Claxton called about once a month to ask after the old gentleman's health; but the good merchant's visits were not very enlivening. He always reported well of Rupert, and therein lay the most valuable portion of his discourse. Except Miss Pringle, no one else ever called. The daily visits of the two lodgers, therefore, were really precious, as tending to rouse and enliven the old man. Mrs. Elliston was like an impudent little robin, twitting and chirruping about him; Mr. Thompson, a mastiff, full of sagacity and strength. He welcomed each after his kind. Mrs. Elliston knelt down beside his chair, and made him laugh by recounting all the misadventures that befell her theatrical companions; how one, having split the most essential portion of his garments, at the moment of appearing on the stage, went through his scene without "changing front," and walked out backwards; how another, remarkable for his absence of mind, when enacting Macbeth, came on clutching a pot of porter, and exclaiming, "Is this a dagger that I see before me?" And then Mr. Marston, being kindled, would recollect stories of the great John Kemble, and Storace, and Madame Catalini, and tell them with much zest; after which exertion he generally slept some hours. By-and-by arrived the mastiff, and aroused him with terrible though friendly growls, telling of savage encounters, brave enterprises, and hairbreadth escapes. With this visit the blind man was always especially delighted; he grew more and more fond of the painter's society, though, true to his character, he never allowed this, and cautiously abstained from any extravagant praise of the individual. Thus:

"How well Mr. Thompson tells a story, father! I know no one who recounts as he does."

"Ah! yes; well enough. A pleasant man, certainly."

"I observe you hear every word he says without difficulty. He has such a charming voice."

"I hear every word that every one says, if they speak distinctly. They needn't scream, like your Aunt Clorinda. You've got into a way of mumbling lately, Olivia, but I used to hear you perfectly."

"Yes, father; I must try and correct myself. I am so sorry Mr. Thompson is going into the country, and won't be here again for three or four days."

"Oh! three or four days? A pleasant man, certainly. Humph! Not much of a trade, his painting, I think: unless he is a Sir Thomas Lawrence or a Romney, eh? Where does he live? Leads a wandering sort of life, it seems. That runs away with a deal of money. 'Take care of the pence, and the pounds 'll take care of themselves.'"

"People who are always thinking of the pence are generally great screws, father; and I'm sure no one hates that, in reality, more than you do."

"Oh! I don't know. I don't know about that — better than a spendthrift any day; but he's a pleasant man, certainly."

More than this qualified praise he never bestowed; yet Olivia knew perfectly well that, within her recollection, no man had ever crossed their threshold whose society her father enjoyed as much as he did Mr. Thompson's. He had never been of a gregarious turn: he had made few friends, and those few were all of the solid, foul-or-fair-weather kind; capital, honourable men, but in whom conversational delightfulness had no part. The painter formed a great contrast to these; and Mr. Marston would have owned it, if the habits of three-score years and ten had not been too strong for him. But he regarded laudation, or, indeed, enthusiasm in any shape, much as he did embraces, kisses, tears, and emotions of any kind whatsoever — womanish extravagances, unbefitting the caution and decorum of a sensible man.

March came — a bleak and bitter March. Mr. Marston caught cold. He could not shake it off for many weeks, and it still further enfeebled him. And after that he went out no more.

Rupert's letter, in reply to his sister's, wherein she had told him of the clock-robbery, and of the acquaintance they had formed with the painter, reached her about this time. In it he said:

"You know how desirable I think it that you should make no acquaintances in your present position; and I should have especially wished you to avoid intimacy with lodgers in the same house. Knowing your impulsive nature, I think I ought to have guarded you particularly against this; but the singularly reserved character of the 'first floor' seemed to render any such warning unnecessary; and the third floor was unoccupied when I left. Of course, now it is too late; and I can only be thankful that Mr. Thompson seems such a thorough gentleman, and that his visits amuse my father. Still, you must not feel annoyed if, as your natural protector (especially since I am at a distance), I look jealously at every one who approaches you, and if I say something which appears to you absurdly premature and groundless. But, remembering how completely blinded you were as to the character of a certain person, not many months ago, and that you showed — shall I call it a susceptibility? — then, which might have become something stronger, I think it necessary to caution you very decidedly against encouraging any romantic ideas about your 'Christopher Columbus in a shabby coat.' You will either laugh or be very angry, no doubt, as you read this. If you profit by it, however, I shall not care for that. This Thompson may be a very delightful person; I dare say he is: still I can't forget that you and I differed considerably as to the delightfulness of J. W. You know absolutely nothing about this painter, and what you tell me you have observed sounds more mysterious than reassuring. For myself, I dislike mysteries. I love things that are above-board; and as I have nothing to conceal myself, I like to know something of the people I live with. Women are different: that cross between sadness and cynicism is always attractive to them; and mystery has a fatal charm. I do not see that Mr. Thompson could have done less than try to recover the clock, when he was in a measure instrumental in the robbery; and because a man is good-natured, and has the trick of talking well, it is no reason why one is to rush into an intimacy with him, without knowing anything of his antecedents. Nothing in the world would make me regret so much having accepted this appointment as to find that during my absence you had been led to fall in love with any one under these conditions.

"As to the little widow, so sweet and innocent-looking a creature must be harmless; and her living with the dragon of respectability you describe makes me easy about your acquaintance with her. I remember her distinctly. I wish I could hear her sing. Here I never get any music, and I thirst exceedingly for some.

Our affairs drag on their weary length, and I see no prospect of getting away at present."

Rupert was right: his sister did not laugh, but she was a good deal annoyed, when she read his letter. To her father she omitted the whole of the passage transcribed, and filled it in with some extraordinary details of Jamaica, supplied by her imagination. When she answered her brother, two days afterwards, she dismissed the subject of his warning lightly, in this vein:

"As to Mr. Thompson, he has a dread of women in general (as he shows, by scarcely tolerating pretty little Mrs. Elliston), and a perfect horror of marriage, of which he had a sad experience for eighteen years; — so you see how groundless your fears are on my account! He is most kind; and dear father and I may really regard him now in the light of a friend. He is so constantly attentive and good to father, that I feel very grateful to him; but as to me, his manner and his openly announced opinion of married life would be sufficient to prove to you that there is no danger on my account. His society is really very valuable to us, and I should grieve very much if father were deprived of it; but you may be quite sure that Mr. Thompson has not the most distant idea of laying siege to your sister's heart, even if that citadel were as insecurely guarded as you seem to think. I am nearly a year older, however, and I hope several years wiser, than I was last May.

"I wish I could give a better account of our darling. These cold winds try him a good deal; and I am afraid he is decidedly weaker. Walking is such an exertion to him that we have given up urging it. We hope that with warmer weather he will regain his strength."

But the warmer weather came, and though the old man rallied a little, he never went out. The habit, once broken, could not be renewed. With loving eyes the faithful daughter watched him day by day. Before him she was always cheerful. Whatever dread or trouble she had at heart, her voice, at least, never betrayed it.

CHAPTER XXI.

The Reason why Mr. Thompson paid Two Morning Visits.

It was now the middle of April. About three weeks after the conversations detailed in the last chapter, Mr. Thompson paid a visit to the Temple one morning. The person he called upon received him with cordiality, but with some surprise.

"What an age it is since I have seen you, my dear fellow! Where have you been hiding? I went to look you up some months ago at the Athenæum; they said you were down in Berkshire, but I was there at Christmas, and heard you were always in London. I suppose there is a lady in the case, eh? A woman is always at the bottom of everything."

"In my case, Heaven forbid! A burnt child dreads the fire. I've suffered enough from a woman. Art is my only mistress now, Hervey. I'm working very hard, and have rooms in a quiet part of the town. I see no one. Frankly, I shouldn't come and see you now, but that I want you to do something for me."

"After that candid avowal, state your wishes. My time is yours — make your mind easy. This is not a brief; it is a French melodrama, in seven acts, I am translating, for want of better to do; so —”

“That is just it. I know your craze for everything connected with a theatre, of old. I believe you know the birth, parentage, and private history of every actor and actress in London, don't you?”

“Oh! you overrate my acquirements. They are not so deep and varied as you think.”

“Do you know anything of a Mrs. Elliston — a little singer at concerts and suburban theatres?”

“Didn't I say a woman was at the bottom of it? Ha! ha! Mrs. Elliston? Let me see. A pretty little fair woman, isn't she? I have never seen her; but I hear fellows make parties to go off into the wilds and hear her, and come away very much smitten. No, I don't know much about her — but I can find out. What is it you want to know?”

“Imprimis, if there is, or ever was, an Elliston: secondly, whether she was divorced from her husband: thirdly, what sort of character she bears.”

“Tharpe — you know Tharpe, the man with the cottage near Westbridge? — is the person to answer your second inquiry at once. His chambers are just over the way — Paper-buildings. Divorces are his special line of country. He can tell you the particulars of every case during the last fifty years, I believe. As to the rest, I can easily find out all you want at the Garrick, this evening.”

“Thanks. As I am here, I'll step over, and see if Tharpe is in. I will call on you in a day or two again, and hear the result of your inquiries.”

“Very good. Don't come on Saturday. I shall be down at Westbridge. They are all very savage with you for never living at the old place, now that you are free. They've got all sorts of absurd shaves about you."

"I dare say: but you know, Hervey, of old, that I never cared much what people thought or said about me. At present I feel I could not go back and live at a place which has nothing but miserable associations for me. Some day or other, perhaps. . . . However, there is no use in talking of that. Tell me, if I find old Tharpe, how about that poor lad of his? He was a nice boy: I always pitied him most heartily. That queer fish, his father, used to bully him so, and I have a vague idea that I heard he had cast him off altogether?"

"No; he lives with him, but he treats him just better than a dog. Poor Algy never will set the Thames on fire, certainly; but he is not quite such a fool as his father thinks — and a better, kinder-hearted young fellow doesn't breathe."

Mr. Thompson seemed to ruminate.

"I must renew my acquaintance with him, some day. We must try and see what can be done for him. Good-bye, Hervey — don't come out. I can find my way."

He descended the old worm-eaten stairs, and crossed to Paper-buildings.

Mr. Tharpe — of whom we shall have to speak more at length hereafter, and will not now stop to describe — was at home.

He, too, elevated his eyebrows in surprise, when Mr. Thompson walked in.

"I was not aware you were in England. It is some years since we met, sir. You have become half a foreigner, I believe, since —”

“I have travelled a good deal, if that is what you mean, since I last saw you, upon a disagreeable matter of business. It is not upon business that I am now come — but to gain a piece of information, if you can supply it.”

“Be good enough, then, to put your question in as direct and close a form as you can. My time is valuable; and though I esteem the honour of a visit from you — that is not upon business — very highly, still, as these are my working hours, I am compelled to beg you to be succinct.”

Mr. Thompson smiled, ever so faintly.

“What I want to know is this. Has there been any divorce case in which the name of Elliston has figured during your recollection? That, at least, I suppose to have been the husband’s name. The wife’s maiden name was Raikes. The name of Elliston which she now bears may be only an assumed one.”

“Elliston? Let us see. I think about the year 1810 —”

“That won’t do. The woman isn’t four-and-twenty yet.”

The barrister referred to some registers, and a volume of memoranda.

“Raikes — there was the great case of Sir Thomas — no, that won’t do. Maiden name, Ellis. Ellison? Can that be it? — circumstantial evidence — twelve children — curious point about settlement — maiden name Smithers — no — Ellison — in flagrante delicto. Hm! Are you sure of the name? If so, there has been no such case this ten years back.”

"I am sure of the name of Raikes — of nothing more."

The barrister looked up with shrewd scrutiny into the other's face.

"If the thing is — is — worth it, we can perhaps —"

"You mean, if I want to marry the lady? I have no such intention. Still, I am willing to give something to learn what I require."

"We entertain pretty much the same ideas upon matrimony, I suspect," laughed Mr. Tharpe — and his laugh was not agreeable. "You, from experience, sir — 'extra lutum pedes habes;' I, upon principle."

"Or the want of it," murmured his visitor. Then, aloud, "Do not misapprehend me, Mr. Tharpe. I have no intrigue with the lady in question. I have reasons for wishing to learn whether she is an honest woman, as I have reasons, also, for doubting the same."

"There are reasons for doubting every woman," sneered the barrister; "and, for my part, I believe some of the most honest often figure in crim. con. cases. They have sacrificed everything probably to one man. They have had what our neighbours call 'le courage de leurs opinions.' Whereas half the wives go on deceiving their husbands to the end of the chapter."

Mr. Thompson did not vouchsafe to say whether he agreed, or disagreed, with Mr. Tharpe. There was a slight shade of hauteur in his manner, as he said that, if Mr. Tharpe could help him in the inquiry he was making, he should feel obliged; and then he asked after his son.

"My son? Oh! He eats about three pounds of meat a day, and drinks his bottle of wine. He is six feet high, and he has a famous digestion. He rides pretty fairly to hounds, and he speaks the truth. There — I don't know that I can tell you anything more to his advantage than that. He does great credit to the University of Oxford, certainly — his acquirements are so vast and varied. You have no children, I think? 'Vanitas vanitatis.' You are spared the humiliation to which we 'proud parents' are subject."

"You prize honesty and health — the two first blessings a man should desire for his son — more lightly than I do," said his visitor. "But I will detain you no longer, Mr. Tharpe. If you hear, as Mr. Joseph Adye would say, of anything to my advantage you will let me know. Good morning."

What was it caused Mr. Thompson to take the unusual step just recorded? A dozen words — a mere broken sentence, overheard, under a lamp in the Strand. No more.

It has been seen that Mr. Thompson, from the first moment he saw Mrs. Elliston, conceived a dislike to that little lady. Time had done nothing to change, or even mitigate, this dislike. He was intolerant of her vanity, of her egotistical garrulity, of her theatrical poses. He was even unjust — as we are prone to be in our aversions — for he did not believe in the sincerity of her declarations of affection for Olivia. He believed she was quite deceived by a woman who, under an innocent, childlike aspect, was anything but innocent or childlike at heart.

But what had Mr. Thompson to do with all this? it will be asked. What business was it of his, if Mrs. Elliston had her little private failings, like other women? Why need he take the ungenerous trouble of dragging them into the light of day? In short, how could it concern him if, in the friendship between two young women, one of them proved unworthy of the confidence placed in her?

This is why. The avowal is premature, inasmuch as he was ignorant of the simple truth himself as yet. With all his mistrust of women, and his horror of matrimony, this recluse was falling in love. He struggled against it; he would not believe it; he laughed the idea to scorn whenever it crossed his mind. Was it possible, after all he had suffered at the hands of a woman, that he should again become subject to a passion which he believed to have burnt out of him years ago? Had he not done with all that, and for ever, when he awoke from that early dream? Had it not become an habitual condition of mind with him to rail against marriage? Why, he would be a fool indeed, now, in his middle age, to begin building up castles anew. Could such a queen among women as this young creature ever care for a worn, battered man, who had had his romance and paid dearly for it, who felt himself embittered and misanthropic, for whom the lees of life alone remained? The thing was impossible. The more he saw of her, the more impossible it seemed. Where was all the young blood of England that it was not at her feet? Where had she lived all the twenty-two years of her life, that this rare treasure had not been found, to crown the home of some man worthy of her? Day by day, for many weeks now, had the painter watched her — watched her every look, her slightest word, with the keen scrutiny of a man whose faith in women has once been rudely shaken. And he saw, with ever-increasing admiration, how, in spite of the little flaws to which all that is human is subject, this nature was pure and sound right through.

It was far too good and too precious a thing for such as he. Therefore he put away from him all idea of possession, all possibility of any immediate personal interest in this matter. It was as a friend, he said to himself—only in the light of a friend—that it was intolerable to him to see Olivia consorting with a creature so unworthy of her, in all ways, as he believed Clara Elliston to be. The sight of this intimacy chafed him: he would give anything to be able to clear up his doubts concerning the lodger upon the third floor; and chance, at last, in the most unexpected manner, seemed likely to befriend him.

He had had business which took him into the Strand that evening. As he neared Exeter Hall, a great tide of people came pouring out, having “supped full of” the “horrors” they had been hearing about convents, from some spirited opponent of the “Scarlet Lady of Babylon,” as the orator styled the Roman Church. Among those most excited to a virulent condition of uncharitableness was Mrs. Crosbie, who, with the aid of her umbrella, had got thus far, to indulge in one of the few mundane pleasures she thoroughly enjoyed. She had cajoled Clara to accompany her, promising her a treat of eloquence such as she had rarely heard; and that little lady being addicted to crowds (a churchful was better than none), and having nothing to do that evening, had developed, for the nonce, a mild intolerance of all religious orders.

For two hours she had been listening to the orator’s rabid denunciations against celibacy in general, and convents in particular; and, if the truth must be spoken, feeling extremely hot, and having no one at all amusing to look at, or be looked at by, in her vicinity, she was nodding with sleep, and uncommonly glad to get out. Some one in the crowd, however, impelled hither, like herself, by curiosity, had recognised her; and this person, by dint of pushing and manœuvring cleverly, managed to get close to Mrs. Elliston as she was coming out, and to separate her somewhat from her elderly companion. She started when he spoke to her, flushed, and then turned white as a sheet: it was clear that she did not recognise the speaker with any pleasure. Still he talked on: the crowd was a long while in getting itself out, and every moment she was separated further and further from Mrs. Crosbie by those whose elbows were more vigorous than that rheumatic lady's.

By one of those coincidences that appear improbable, and are not, perhaps, in reality, so very uncommon, just as the little widow and her companion reached the street, the person of all others in London most curious and interested in watching her movements chanced to be passing, and was himself arrested by the crowd, pouring out in one dense stream.

Mr. Thompson caught sight of her pale excited face, upturned towards the tall good-looking man who bent over her. She was speaking with great volubility, but in so low a voice that, though Thompson found himself pressed by the crowd close to her, he only heard the words, "Death-bed — never after your — spared me the painful — cruel — sacrificed all for you." There was a smile of something like derision upon her companion's face, and though what he said was inaudible, that it was in some sense an accusation might be inferred from Mrs. Elliston's impetuous exclamation, "It is not true; it is not true!" What followed, Thompson could not catch; he had pushed the wide-awake further over his brow, and his coat-collar concealed the lower part of his face, but it would not have been difficult to recognise him, had the speaker only glanced round. She was too much absorbed in her vehement colloquy with the man beside her to notice any one; and her pretty blooming face was so transformed by passionate agitation that she seemed no longer to be the same woman. She looked once or twice anxiously towards the door for Mrs. Crosbie; and she kept her stand there on the pavement, the crowd drifting past her; Thompson, meantime, leaning with his back to the wall close by, where, if he could not hear what she said, he could at least watch her every movement. The gaunt scooped form of Mrs. Crosbie in her black flaccid robes at last appeared on the steps; in an instant, with a rapid word and gesture, Mrs. Elliston evidently bade her companion leave her, and turned her face from him towards her aunt. The man raised his eyebrows, smiled, hesitated for half a moment, and then moved on with the crowd. Thompson had never seen this person before; but his features were now firmly engraven on his mind. Wherever and whenever they might meet, he felt sure he should recognise him.

This is what gave him food for thought and speculation all that night; this is what led him to pay Messrs. Hervey and Tharpe visits the next day.

And with what result?

Two days later he received a note from Hervey to the following effect:

"I have made inquiries in various quarters about Mrs. E. You know how ready men are to invent, or conclude things about a woman in that position; but I can hear of nothing the least definite against this one. Her husband (for there was a bonâ-fide husband, and no divorce) died two or three years ago, and her name has never been coupled before, or since, with any other man's; though she seems to have a host of admirers, and not to discourage them altogether. She is, in fact, I presume, a little woman fond of admiration, like most of her class — but no worse than this. Several fellows have been after her, I hear, and she condescends occasionally to receive their presents; but she is extremely wide awake, and never does anything to compromise herself. Is this satisfactory? Tell me if there is anything more you want to find out."

It was by no means satisfactory to Mr. Thompson; and there was a great deal more he would have learned, if he could; but with this information he was, perforce, obliged to be satisfied for the present.

CHAPTER XXII.

Deepening Shadows.

MRS. ELLISTON'S engagement at the theatre being at an end, and her endeavours to obtain another not yet having proved successful, she had much more time on her hands, and a great portion of this she liberally gave to Olivia Marston.

Not only were the Italian lessons more regular than heretofore; she was constantly running down with some piece of work for advice — some exercise to be corrected, some scrap of poetry or historical question demanding an opinion or answer, for which Olivia's small store of books was called into requisition. Nor was this all: for she was ever ready to be useful; pleased to help Olivia in making clothes out of sundry odds and ends for the poor children I have already named; happy to read to Mr. Marston, if at any moment his daughter was called away; and exerting herself as much to be bright and pleasant to that blind old man and his daughter as if the room had been filled with the jeunesse dorée of London.

Her lessons to the alderman's daughters had led to others; and now most mornings she was away for an hour or two; but where and to whom these lessons were given did not always very distinctly appear. There was a Mrs. Pierce, whose name was always brought forward whenever Olivia inquired where her friend had been: but when questioned as to where this lady lived, Clara Elliston vaguely replied that it was in Pimlico; she could find her way to the house, but never remembered the name of the street. Somehow or other, these lessons did not seem to replenish her purse very materially. Either she was a bad manager or her pupils were not punctual in their payments; she never had any money. But then, it is true, she had constantly new and very smart clothes. One day it was a bonnet; anon, a velvet mantle. When Olivia reproached her with her extravagance, Clara always assured her that these acquisitions were second-hand, that she had got them for a mere song, of Mrs. Levi (who had them from a duchess's lady's maid), and that she was in absolute and dire necessity for those articles, without which she could not possibly present herself at Mrs. Bloom's and elsewhere.

In Olivia's visits to her poor neighbours, she was often accompanied by Clara. The latter would busy herself with the younger children, or talk to the sick mother, or make a cup of the tea she brought with her (stolen from Aunt Crosbie's canister), while Olivia gave her sewing or reading lesson. To see the way in which Clara threw herself, heart and soul, into this sort of work, to watch her bustling about the miserable room, to hear her merry laugh, to note the pains she was at to bring comfort and pleasure to these poor people, always dispelled any misgivings from Olivia's mind as to her friend. How could anything be really amiss in one who had such kind instincts? such a desire to win the love or gratitude of every human being she met, down to a bedridden woman, and her ragged children?

One day, on their way home from one of these visits, the two ladies went into the Lowther Arcade to buy something Olivia wanted. While making her purchase at the stall, she observed that Clara, who had moved on a few yards, was accosted by a shabby middle-aged woman. This person's manner seemed to Olivia to be so strange that she watched her with some curiosity. Her face, which was not a bad one, kindled up, and wore a half-piteous half-angry expression; she spoke with volubility, and used a good deal of action with a pair of very dirty ungloved hands. Mrs. Elliston's back was towards Olivia when the woman addressed the former. She turned quickly round and caught Olivia's eye; her own looked startled, and she was very pale. She moved a pace or two further from Olivia; and the shabby woman, talking all the time, followed her. In the bustle and din of the crowded arcade, it was impossible Olivia could have heard a word of their conversation; but no doubt Mrs. Elliston was wise. She presently drew from her pocket something which she put into the woman's hand. It was received apparently under protest. There was now much gesticulation on both sides. The little pink bonnet was pressed closely, deprecatingly, under the shabby black one, which shook energetically over a very dissatisfied face. Then the pretty shoulders in the velvet mantle, which were still turned towards Olivia, performed that expressive pantomime which says, "Que voulez-vous? I can do no more." Finally the tightly gloved little hand pressed the grimy, gloveless one several times with effusion, and then Clara Elliston drew down her spotted veil and turned away.

The shabby woman looked after her, and sighed, and muttered something; and then she scanned Olivia with curiosity, as Mrs. Elliston joined her; and then, when they were out of sight, she counted her money — for it was money — in her hand.

"Who is that woman?" said Olivia, abruptly.

"Her name is — — Boyce."

"Has she anything to do with the theatre?"

"No — yes; the fact is, dear, I owe her a little money. I've given her now what I could. I can't do more."

"Ah, Clara! and how about that new gown? Is it honest to go on thus, when you already owe money? I suspected this, you know, before."

"I must have clothes to my back, dear; and the gown was dirt cheap."

"Nonsense! You provoke me. And that lace shawl, pray? Do you call that a necessity? The money it cost would probably have paid this poor woman what you owe her."

"Shall I confess something to you, Olivia? That lace shawl — I didn't like to tell you at the time — was an anonymous cadeau. I haven't an idea who sent it; but it came with the sweetest lines addressed to 'Our St. Vincent Nightingale.'"

"Clara, are you telling me the strict truth?"

Olivia fixed her clear, unflinching eyes upon the little creature beside her.

"Yes, dear, indeed I am — I don't know; of course I may guess a dozen people, but I don't know the least who sent it."

"And you take very good care not to find out."

"Why, what would you have me do?"

"Tax the person you suspect. If you find you are mistaken, sell the shawl, and pay that woman what you owe her. Your anonymous friend is no true friend if he is not glad to help you to do what is honest."

"But," said Clara, astutely, "if I sell the shawl, you see, I put it out of my power to return it, in case I discover the donor."

Olivia walked on in silence. Her intelligence was too good to be blinded by this sophistry; or, indeed, not to see clearly that her companion had no wish or intention to return the gift, from whatever quarter it might have come. It was little things of this kind — this and the bluntness of sense to the degradation of being indebted to a poor woman such as Mrs. Boyce — that made Olivia occasionally shrink from Clara Elliston, and feel uncomfortable in her society. It was impossible that Olivia and a woman who showed so little delicacy of feeling could have much in common. But then, after a while, came the reaction: some act of kindness to the old man, her childlike laugh and prattle (who could listen to it, and not “make allowances” for the pretty, foolish young creature?), her very helplessness, and the dangerous position in which Olivia saw that she was placed, were all so many arguments that pleaded for her. As regarded Clara, Olivia might be said to pass her life now in alternations of anger and commiseration, of hardening and softening, of tenderness and contempt. But her loyalty forbade her ever letting a word or hint of this escape her in her intercourse with Mr. Thompson. Knowing how much he disliked Clara, Olivia carefully abstained from all mention of her, when absent: when present, her object was to make Clara appear to him in the best light. Who does not know what a thankless task this is, between two friends with a mutual aversion? How every word that is dropped by the one seems calculated to inflame the antipathy of the other! And how both show to the worst possible advantage!

Shortly after this, Mrs. Elliston got an engagement at the new Pimlico Theatre, three nights a week. She was paid every Saturday morning; and yet it seemed to Olivia that she never had six-pence in her pocket if she wanted it. You may be sure that Olivia did not rest contented with this: she questioned and cross-questioned her friend, urging her to pay any bills she owed, now she had the money, and before it all oozed away. This Clara, with her habitual promptitude, promised to do.

Little by little, Thompson had learnt all that there was to be told of the Marstons' history. Olivia often spoke enthusiastically of her brother, and said that their hopes now centred in him. She talked openly of their past life — of their long residence abroad, and then of the Cedars, which had been such a happy home to her. She told him of the comparative seclusion in which she had lived, and then of the Pomfrets. He listened with great interest.

"And you liked that sort of life, did you? Were not your neighbours, prying into all your concerns, a great bore to you at first, after the freedom of the Continent? There, or in a great city like this, no one knows or cares what one does."

"I should not have liked to remain at Fordingham when we became poor," said Olivia, simply. "I hope it isn't false pride; but when one is poor, it is so much more difficult to refuse kindness or civility from people one doesn't like."

She had no fear of his misunderstanding her; although he had brought a case of rare old wine to her father the day before, saying that it had been sent him by a friend, and that he never touched wine himself.

"I wonder at your living in London," she went on, presently — "you, who are such a worshipper of Nature, and a painter, too! What attraction can you find in murky London?"

He might have replied, and truly, that he had found an attraction there, which was growing daily stronger and stronger for him. But he said, instead:

"I will not give you a reason which is quite good enough for the world in general — that I can't pursue my art as easily, can't have models, and so on. The real reason is, that my own home, my own country, is embittered to me by wretched associations. I cannot shake them off. When I return to the rooms where I passed so many miserable days, and weeks, and months at a time, I suffer so acutely; I suffer there from a sense of degradation so much more than I can possibly do elsewhere, that I cannot face it. It is weak: no one knows that better than I do. In time, perhaps, I shall be stronger. The wound is still fresh. By and by, when it is healed, I shall go back, I suppose, like the wild beasts, to end my days in the solitary den."

He had never said so much about himself before; and there was a sadness in the tone, no less than in the words themselves, which brought the tears into Olivia's eyes.

"You have never done anything, I am certain, for which you ought justly to feel ashamed," she said, impulsively; "and oh! Mr. Thompson, if it is for the sins of others — others, who are gone — that you feel so acutely, leave them to God's mercy; don't trouble about man's judgment. Is it worth so much? I don't think so."

"It is not man's judgment," he replied. "I am very indifferent to the country gossips pulling about the various skeletons in my cupboard. It is the shameful thing, and not the shame of its being talked about, that poisons a man's life — a man whose pride is not pinchbeck. I should not mind telling you that miserable story, Miss Marston, but it would not be a pleasant one for you to hear — or a good one for me to tell, now that the wretched woman is gone. It would shock you to hear a bereaved husband speak as I must do of the curse of my existence. Yet she was the most beautiful woman I have ever seen — far more so than your little actress, though in the same style, and looking quite as innocent and childlike. Do you wonder that I hate fair women?"

One evening, at dusk, some days after this, Olivia was at her piano, playing, by heart, a bit of Mozart, which had been a favourite of her mother's. The music carried her far away, upon a train of sad thought: she did not hear a low knock at the door, nor see, in the gathering darkness, that some one entered the room. The fire-light fell on the silver hair and pale shrunken features of the old man who slept in his arm-chair; it just trembled fitfully, no more, upon the profile of the girl at the piano. The painter stole up, and leaning both elbows on it, he stood there, with his head bent over towards the player, who, unconscious of his presence, kept dreamily repeating that old air.

Presently, the music, of a sudden, stopped: one hand hung listlessly on the keys; she bowed her head forward upon the music-desk, and a low sob broke from her.

She rarely gave way thus. Only sometimes, when alone, did a sudden terror master her, as she thought of her lonely future, if the one human being, who was dependent on her for love and care, were taken. When her narrow round of duty here had closed, what lay before her? Rupert had his own career. He would marry, and not want her. The Future — ah, the Future! A hand was laid gently upon the hand which had fallen on the keys: its touch thrilled her.

A shiver, but not of fear (for she felt at once whose hand it was), ran through her. She raised her head — so quickly that the painter's beard, as he leant across the piano, brushed her forehead, before he had time to draw back.

"Forgive me, if I startled you," he said, gently. "Are you in sorrow? What is the matter? — I cannot bear to see you in distress. Will you treat me as a friend — something more than a recent acquaintance, and let me know your trouble?"

"It is only a woman's weakness," she said, hurriedly, as she brushed the tears away. "I think I have been upset by a letter from my brother, to-day, in which he tells me there is no chance of his coming home yet awhile."

"Do you think you know enough of me now to trust me, Miss Marston? Will you let me be to you in the light of a brother, during his absence? Never be afraid of troubling me — ask me to do anything for you, and let me help you, as best I can, whenever you are in any doubt or difficulty. Your father, I think, likes me; and I take a great pleasure in being with him — indeed, you can see that it is one of the very few interests I have in my solitary life."

How inadequately he expressed himself! How cold the words fell upon his own ear! He, whose heart was speaking such impassioned language all the time, dared only utter this.

"You are very good to us; and I do trust you implicitly," she faltered. "I don't know what dear father would do without you now, Mr. Thompson, to cheer him occasionally. His few other friends are all away. I am afraid. . . . Do you see much change in him? . . . Does he seem to you weaker?"

"Who's there?" cries out Mr. Marston, suddenly waking up. "I hear voices — but you keep the room so confoundedly dark, there's no seeing the way to one's mouth, Olivia."

"It is very dark. I will ring for the lamp, darling. Mr. Thompson has just come in to see you."

A week or two passed. It was May now, and had become, of a sudden, oppressively warm. To the suffering in body, and to the sad at heart, there is nothing so trying as such weather, at this season. The sunshine is intolerable: the rush of life through everything is a mockery and a grievance, to all who cannot go forth and sing with the birds. The blind old gentleman in his arm-chair felt it, though unconsciously: the life-renewing season brought no increase of vigour to him, but the reverse. And his daughter felt it, but consciously. As she looked from her upper window, across the river, beyond the wharves and store-houses, beyond the old Palace of Lambeth — no chance of country, of green fields and pleasant places that the May sunshine seemed to tell of — and then up at the troop of white fleecy clouds driven seaward by the light west wind, she felt a weight at heart which she had never known in the dark winter weather. She was a brave girl, who had fought her troubles nobly and quietly, without any heroic airs and graces. She had forced herself, for months past, to live in the actual present, seldom looking backward or forward; but now the sweet glad season of hopes and promises was come, she could not shut her eyes to the truth. She would soon be left alone in the world. That dear father, who had been her first thought and study since her mother's death, was fading slowly away: she knew it. A few weeks more, perhaps, and then the arm-chair below would be empty. For his sake, how could she wish it otherwise? but for her own — ah! what had the May sunshine, with its promises of happiness, in store for her? When she thought of it, there was one face, and one alone, which always rose up before her eyes; but it did not smile upon her. It was a grave kindly face, as of a pitying and protecting friend: very far from that of an ardent lover. And then, even in her solitude, she coloured, and sighed, and tried to bend her thoughts some other way. She remembered the words in Rupert's letter. She remembered, with shame, how once (not yet six months ago) another face, younger and handsomer, yet not comparable to this one, had often been present with her, when she was alone; and how, foolish girl! she had, at one moment, gone nigh to believe herself in love with its owner. Was it possible that she could so soon fall again into a like pitiable error? Westbrook might have had his failings, but he was certainly, more or less, attached to her. Her pride could take refuge in the reflection that he had paid her very marked attention. With this man it was quite different. He was a very kind thoughtful friend, but there never was anything like tenderness in his manner. She believed that his heart was shut against all woman's love: she had the evidence of his own lips that he loathed the very name of marriage. During all their intercourse, at first, she had been so perfectly unrestrained; and now, she felt herself so often shy with him. Her pride, poor child, her dread of appearing forward, made her seem cold at times, and she knew it. No wonder he misunderstood this — that he attributed it to her desire to check any admiration on his part, and show him the true nature of her feeling towards him. Could he have overheard part of a conversation, one day, between Miss Pringle and her niece, this impression would have been more than confirmed. That lady, in calling upon Mr. Marston, had met Mr. Thompson for the first time.

“A fine man, my dear,” she said, when he was gone; “so very firmly knit — and a je ne sais quoi about him, which looks as if he must belong to the Thompsons of Yorkshire — eh? How did you make his acquaintance, my love?”

“He is an artist — and his studio is in this house.”

“An artist? Dear! dear! You don’t say so. Well! I never should have thought it. It’s rather dangerous, I must say — such a good-looking man, and coming in here at all hours! You must really be careful, Olivia, not to offer the man any encouragement, you know; for it would never do. An artist! And you might yourself be led —”

“Mr. Thompson and I perfectly understand each other,” interrupted her niece, loftily. “You need be under no apprehension, Aunt Clo. He comes here solely out of compassion and friendliness to my dear father; and he knows quite well the nature of my sentiments towards him.”

“Well, my love, I am glad to hear it — only mistakes will arise in these cases, sometimes. I remember an apothecary, at Cheltenham — it was in the year 1811 — the man attended me for a quinsy. I immediately saw how the wind lay; but it was impossible for me to speak (as my throat was closed), and tell him that his hopes were in vain; still I couldn't bear to see the poor wretch so self-deluded, and, when I got better, I wrote to him. I believe it half crazed him, for he replied that he didn't know what I meant. Therefore, you see, my dear, how necessary it is to be careful, and not to foster intimacies with men in that sort of station; it may be misunderstood — and where the man has a fine figure, as in this case —”

“You make my blood boil. For Heaven's sake, no more on this subject, aunt! Once for all, Mr. Thompson is a thorough gentleman. As to himself and his position, any woman, who loved him, might be proud to be his wife. But there is no thought or question of any such matter here. It is intolerable that, living in the same house, he cannot visit a blind old man without its giving rise to these absurd, groundless surmises! I must beg,” added the young lady, with great dignity. “that you will never speak to me of Mr. Thompson again, in this way.”

By which it will be seen that, had he been eaves-dropping, that gentleman would have heard nothing to unsettle the very erroneous faith that was in him. And now we come to an event which powerfully affected Olivia, and which, though apparently unconnected with herself, was destined to influence her conduct hereafter, in one of the most trying junctures of her life.

It was the middle of May; and the day had been one of frequent showers. Olivia had occasion to go up to Mrs. Elliston's room in the afternoon, and found her, as usual, engaged in trimming a dress. She was in high spirits, and in one of her mischievous moods, seeming to take delight in provoking Aunt Crosbie.

Some lilies of the valley were in a jug beside her. Towards these unoffending flowers Mrs. Crosbie was directing her observations, in no gentle tone, as Olivia entered.

"Goin' spending money upon that rubbish! You ought to be ashamed of yourself, Clara! when you haven't given a sixpence to the missionary-box, I don't know when! I should like to know what good a lot of flowers, that cost ever so much, will do your soul? And when you're going this evening into a society of awakened Christians, to be fallalling of your gown in that way, and dressing up with flowers for all the world like the sweeps on May-day. What's the use of it, I wonder?"

"I observe that your awakened Christians are very fond of smart clothes, Aunt Crosbie. The only time I ever went to a religious tea-party at Clapham, I was quite dazzled. And one lady told me they did it 'on principle.' Mayn't I wear my poor innocent lilies 'on principle'?"

"Be still, Clara, will you? You pervert pious words with your levity; and, except for vanity's sake, you're the idlest do-naught —"

"Like my lilies. 'They toil not; neither do they spin.' Ah, there you are, Olivia! I'm going to a party, dear, to-night — a very large religious rout at Clapham. A friend of Aunt Crosbie's calls for us, and being an off night at the theatre, I can go. I intend to do a great deal of execution among the religious youth of Clapham."

"Have done, Clara, will you?"

"And Aunt Crosbie is indignant with me for investing in a few lilies. You see I am going in for innocence and simplicity — nothing but white. I was never but once before at anything of the sort — a much smaller affair — and then the tea was delicious. I say nothing about the prayers. But there was a very good-looking young man who —”

“Clara! will you ha’ done? Miss Marston — ma’am — I’m —”

“Well, then, aunt, I won’t say anything more about the good-looking young man. Olivia, how do those flowers look in my hair?”

“I think, with your aunt, that they are unsuited to the occasion,” she replied. But in her heart she could not but say that it was impossible for anything to be prettier than the fair young creature was, with those white flowers — those emblems of perfect purity — in her sunny hair. Clara smiled with a conscious triumph, as detecting what passed in her friend’s thoughts, while Olivia stood there looking at her.

Little did Olivia dream it was the last time she would ever so look upon her — that when she next saw that face it would be distorted by agony and passion; and that never again until the sun of life had set, and the stains of sin and suffering were washed away, should she behold Clara Elliston with eyes such as she then bent down on her.

CHAPTER XXIII.

In the Dead of Night.

It was a wet night. Mr. Marston dozed by the fire, as usual. The clock on the mantel-piece struck half-past eight. Olivia heard Mrs. Flaherty in the passage in conversation with another woman, whose voice sounded shrill and eager. But this was no unusual circumstance: Olivia went on with her book.

Presently there was a knock at the door.

"Come in," said Olivia; and Mrs. Flaherty entered.

"Here's a famale, plase, miss, who wants Mrs. Elliston very bad, and if I could tell her where she is. And I says, 'Maybe as Miss Marston can tell ye, which is her partic'lar friend;' for indeed she's in a fine taking, and says it's a matter o' life and death. So you will plase speak to her, miss?"

Olivia went into the passage. A middle-aged woman, shabbily dressed, stood there. She was evidently in great agitation. The tears stood in her eyes, and the somewhat dirty hands that held her shawl together twitched incessantly, or pulled at the unravelled fringe, while she spoke. Olivia recognised the woman at once as the person who had accosted Clara in the Lowther Arcade some weeks before. It was probable that Mrs. Boyce, on her side, also recognised Olivia. She eyed her very keenly, and her voice shook as she said:

"I ax your pardon, ma'am; but can you tell me where Mrs. Elliston is to be found?"

"Indeed, I cannot. She is gone with Mrs. Crosbie to a party at Clapham, and will not be home till late, that is all I know."

"My God!" said the woman, yet more agitated, "what is to be done? Is there no one who knows where she is?"

"Sure, if the young lady can't tell ye, there's nobody else can," observed Mrs. Flaherty.

"You had better wait till she returns," Olivia said, seeing that the woman was almost distracted, and was turning to the door. "She cannot be later than eleven, I think."

"Eleven? Two hours and a half! I can't — I can't. Every five minutes — and me without money, too, for the 'pothecary. O my! O my!"

Suddenly she turned sharp round, and looking up into Olivia's face with eyes from which the tears now streamed, laid a hand upon her arm.

"Young lady, may I see you a minute alone?"

Olivia opened the sitting-room door.

"Don't you be givin' her money, miss," whispered Mrs. Flaherty. "I knows them sort of old, as pipes their eye afore they begs. If tears was guineas, they'd be as rich as Giewes, they would."

The woman followed Olivia, and shut the door behind her. She then glanced uneasily at Mr. Marston.

"He cannot hear you," said Olivia. "What is it you want of me?"

The woman came quite close, and said in a low voice:

"You are her friend, ain't you?"

"Mrs. Elliston's? Yes, I am."

"Has she ever talked to you about —?" She stopped, and scanned Olivia's face more searchingly than ever. "God forgive me if I oughtn't to — to tell you. He has given you a kind face — you won't betray her? Promise me that, miss."

"Betray her? You must tell me nothing Mrs. Elliston would not tell me herself. If you have anything to say to her, write it. I promise it shall be delivered faithfully into no hand but her own."

"Ah! it may be too late then! — too late! — and I don't know what to do — where to go for advice!" sobbed the woman, wringing her hands. "Swear to me you'll not betray her, ma'am!"

"I will not," said Olivia, in a low voice, and she leant upon the table. A nameless dread — a sick apprehension of — she knew not what — came over her.

"It's her child, miss! There — there, it's out now — her child who's dyin' o' croup, poor precious babe! and she away, and no doctor come yet, nor nothin'!"

"Her child?" repeated Olivia, mechanically. A confused sense of some dark mystery struggled in her mind, with the natural question, if she has a child, what need of concealment? The next instant, the child's danger was the thought paramount in her mind. She knew something of the croup.

"It is in your charge, this child? And what have you done? When was he taken ill?"

"About four o'clock. We put him into a warm bath, and he got a deal better; and as we was easy about him, and I didn't like to leave him, and I hadn't nobody to send, why I didn't come off then. But after dusk he got bad again, and then we sent for the doctor, and he was out; and still the poor darling got worse; and I'm sure I love him like my own," said the woman, with a fresh burst, "for all Mrs. Elliston is so irreg'lar in her payments; and I'd strip the clothes off my back for the poor darling, I'm that fond of him; and it's now three years, ever since he was born, I've had him. But I says to myself, says I, 'She's his own nat'ral mother, that'll come to me, if her baby dies, and 'll say, "Mrs. Boyce, you should ha' told me."' And so I sets off straight to the address she give me in the Strand — a news-agent's — and they sent me on here, and —"

"Stay. Where do you live?"

"Three, Catherine-street, Pimlico, miss; and I hope the doctor's there long afore this, though I walked as fast as I could."

Olivia was writing something on a piece of paper while the woman spoke.

"Get into a hansom. You say truly, every moment is of consequence. Drive to this address. If the doctor is not at home, drive to this one; if not, to this one. You must find a doctor: don't return to the house without one; and get back as fast as you can. If Mrs. Elliston is not home presently, I shall come to the house myself. That will pay for your cab;" and she put some shillings into the woman's hand.

She went out and opened the front door for Mrs. Boyce, and then sat down for a few moments, to consider what she had best do.

Her decisions were always very rapidly come to. They were unstable, being founded too often by an irregular surface of impulse; and her knowledge of the world and its conventionalities was small: but she seldom hesitated.

On this occasion one consideration only weighed with her — how to leave her father before his usual bedtime, and get away to this poor child in the absence of his own mother. Mrs. Boyce had evidently lost her head; the doctor might not reach the child till late at night. Olivia had seen several cases of croup, and knew how it should be treated. As to the “impropriety” of her going out at that hour, it never weighed with her for an instant. And as to the mystery which so uncomfortably surrounded this poor child’s existence, what had that to do with this question of life and death? She returned to her father, purposely making some noise as she shut the door.

“What’s that?” said the blind man, rousing himself up in his chair. “I haven’t been asleep, Olivia. Where did you leave off? The massacre at Cawnpore — terrible, indeed! Sixty women, did you say? ta, ta, ta!”

“Dear father, it is getting late — time for us to go to bed.”

“It is not ten o’clock yet,” he replied, resolutely. She crept up to the clock, and moved on the hour hand. It wanted twenty minutes of nine: its sharp little voice now told out ten tiny strokes, and she rang for Fritz.

How easy it was to deceive him! He never demurred or questioned further. The daughter’s heart almost smote her, as she whispered to Fritz:

“Put your master to bed, and when he is asleep come to me.”

She went up-stairs, and fetched her bonnet and cloak. Then she sat down and wrote a few lines to the poor mother.

"Mrs. Boyce has been here. Your child is very ill. I am gone to see if I can be of any use, and shall remain by its bedside until you come.

"OLIVIA.

"N. B. — Neither Mrs. Flaherty nor any one else in this house knows where I am gone, nor of the child's illness."

She sealed this up in a thick envelope, and rang for Mrs. Flaherty. That excellent woman appeared, looking somewhat injured.

"I'll be bound that watery jade got money out o' ye, miss, and —"

"Listen, my good Mrs. Flaherty. I want you to be of service to me. I know I can place the utmost confidence in you. I am obliged to go out, and I think — I suppose it is right — to take Fritz with me. Will you sit here, while we are gone? We shall not be long, I think. The door into my father's room will remain open. I cannot have him left alone at night. And as soon as Mrs. Elliston returns, will you give this into her own hand — no one else's?"

"And is it for the likes of her, miss, ye are going out, with Mr. Freetz, at sich an hour as this? leavin' me with a responsibility that — not that I minds the responsibility of the dear ould gentleman in his bed — bless 'im! But is it dacent for a young thing like you, as is properly carriage folk, Mr. Freetz informs me, to be cuttin' about at night, and all for a four-pair back attic, as one may say! It's a shame."

"People have feelings, my dear woman, whether they live in palaces or attics. There is some one very ill, whom poor Mrs. Elliston and I are interested about. I am going to this sick bedside, until she can get there. Now, I'm sure you won't say another word, but do all I ask you."

Of course Mrs. Flaherty did say a great many more words, but she promised to obey Olivia's injunctions; and a few minutes later, Fritz mounted on the box of a cab, inside which was his young mistress, and told the driver to go to Catherine-street, Pimlico.

Fritz had military habits of obedience to his commanding officers. He may have wondered in his own mind at this strange freak of his major-in-command (when his colonel was asleep), but even in his own mind he was a tremendous disciplinarian; and as to an open question or demur, he would have sentenced himself to fourteen days' solitary confinement, I think, had he found himself so sinning. There he sat on the box, with his arms folded, trying very hard to make his mind a blank; or, failing in this, to force it back on the contemplation of the Bologna sausage he had just had for supper.

It was a poor little house in a dirty street, when they got there. The door was opened by a woman — another lodger in the house, who took in washing with Mrs. Boyce, as Olivia afterwards knew.

Mrs. Boyce had not yet come back; no doctor had been. Several neighbours — mothers, whose children had been ill of croup — were gathered together in the bedroom, and were offering their opinions on the case, with such advice as their experience dictated. The atmosphere, when Olivia entered, nearly drove her back; but under the impression that this was the mother who was come at last to her child's sick-bed, and on the woman of the house telling them that the lady wished the room cleared, they all adjourned to the kitchen.

A beautiful boy of three years old lay upon that humble little bed. He was gasping for breath, as Olivia entered; exhausted with the violence of the last paroxysm, which had then somewhat abated; but conscious of everything around him. At the sound of the opening door, he moaned feebly:

"Where's nurse? why doesn't she come back? why does she leave me all alone?"

"Mamma will come presently, darling," whispered Olivia, kneeling down by the child's cot.

"I don't want mamma, I want nurse," he sobbed.

"Oh! lady, I'm so ill! and cruel nurse leaves me: why does she do it? Tell her to come back, or I shan't, shan't never see her again."

"Nurse is gone for a doctor for you, darling. When he comes, he will make you quite well."

"Nurse! nurse! I don't want any one but you. Take it off my throat. I can't breathe, nurse!"

"She will come presently, darling. A few minutes' patience. Now I am going to put something on your throat that will make you easier, I hope."

The child shook his head and moaned, and kept feebly repeating his nurse's name over and over again. She was the one thought, the one wish, in his little mind. There was none for his own mother.

*

*

*

*

Half an hour passed. The child was in her arms now. He seemed rapidly sinking. What if he should die before further help could reach him? She had done all she could think of, and her heart sank within her, as the minutes went by: it would very soon be too late. And the miserable mother, passing her evening in a search after amusement at the other end of London!

At last, a cab drove up. Thank God! She heard a heavy step upon the stair. Mrs. Boyce threw open the door, and a doctor entered. While he examined the child, the former whispered in a trembling voice to Olivia:

"Oh, miss. He was the third. I thought I never should find one. Such a ride! and I am afraid it's too late, now!"

It was too late. The doctor did all he could: had he been called in an hour sooner, he said, he might perhaps have saved the child. It was an unusually rapid case. About twelve o'clock he breathed his last in Mrs. Boyce's arms, the good woman who had been to him as a mother — the only one he had ever known.

Olivia could not bring herself to leave her directly; the poor creature's distress was so great. And then the wretched mother must be here ere long; it was better that Olivia should break this to her. She had brought enough money to pay the doctor; and the two women were now alone.

Olivia helped to smooth out the little limbs, and to lay fresh linen upon the cot, and let Mrs. Boyce sob and talk away the violence of her sorrow and self-reproach unstemmed.

"If I'd ha' gone at once to him, miss! It was all along of my tryin' to find Mrs. Elliston first; and she, 'as never give me her real address — only a news-agent! 'When you wants to write to me,' says she,

'direct A. E., at the news-agent's.' Of course I knew her name well enough, and all about it — you understand, miss — only where she lived I didn't know. And I've waited weeks and weeks for my money, sooner than go and dun her — but I've a-written till I was tired — and then at last she'd come, one mornin,' and tell me how hard put to it she was for money, and pay me in part. So you see, until to-night, miss, I never rightly knew where to find her; and now, p'rhaps, it's cost the precious babe his life. O my!"

Olivia sighed heavily. Alas! were not her misgivings about Clara more than justified? What more remained to be disclosed? She dreaded to think of it. She tried to say a word or two of comfort to the poor woman, but her tongue faltered, and then Mrs. Boyce went on again:

"Three years, come Christmas, since she brought him to me — as fine a babe, brought up by hand, miss, as you ever see. And a sweet-tempered, too — bless his poor dear little heart! I'm sure there's not a thing I'd not ha' done for him. O my! And to think I shall never see his pretty blue eyes open on me again — and all the neighbours as fond of him as they was too! It was always 'Harry come here,' or 'Harry come there;' but I was very partic'lar, I was — and if your own mother, my babe, was ashamed of you," she added, stooping down to kiss the little wax-like face, "there was one wasn't, leastways."

Was she really so heartless, then? Olivia would fain have asked more about the wretched mother, but she refrained. Poor miserable woman! God help her now!

Mrs. Boyce, with the excitement of grief common in her class, continued presently:

"Not a penny of her money for near three weeks! Why did I leave you to go after her? I should ha' stayed, and nursed you myself, and have sent the neighbours. P'rhaps you wouldn't have gone, if I'd bin here, my darlin'. It was all your poor foolish nurse's fault — it was. And what can she care for you like me? she, who comes here once a week dressed so smart, and yet has left you for six months and more, with nought but a ragged p'lisse, and scarce shoes and stockin's to y'r feet, my poor babe! She didn't care for you — she didn't — or she couldn't ha' let you out of her sight — and that's the truth on't."

But even now a cab was heard driving up furiously to the door, and the good woman's face and voice dropped simultaneously. In her excitement she had said far more than she really meant: her eyes showed now how she shrank from this interview with the bereaved mother. Olivia went down-stairs.

It was Mrs. Elliston, deadly pale, in her white evening dress; her hair, in which were still the lilies — now faded and broken — hanging half down her shoulders, over which was thrown an opera-cloak.

She grasped Olivia's hand in hers, and looked up into her face; but the only words she could find to say, in a low hoarse voice, were:

"O Olivia! The child ——?"

"The doctor has been here. The child, alas! is so ill, that — he cannot be worse. You must prepare yourself, Clara, for ——"

"Not dead? Don't say he's dead, Olivia!"

She almost screamed the words; then with the sudden strength of agony, without waiting for a reply, she rushed past her up-stairs. She opened the door, looked, and fell upon her knees by the bed in a convulsion of grief. And over the terrible hour that followed we will draw a veil.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Confession.

OLIVIA would now have returned home. She had been absent more than two hours. But Mrs. Elliston supplicated not to be left: she was sobbing there upon the floor, raving out her self-reproaches, clasping the little dead body, and covering it with her passionate kisses; and then, anon, turning to Olivia, and imploring her not to leave her — not to betray her.

Seeing how utterly helpless the wretched mother was, Olivia undertook to give the necessary instructions as to what had to be done; and then, feeling that she had no longer any business here, away from her father, the thought struck her to suggest that Mrs. Crosbie should be sent to Clara.

"You ought not to be alone. Will you let your aunt come to you?"

"No — no! I would rather die than that! For God's sake don't tell her — dear, dear Olivia, don't."

"I cannot stay with you. I must return to my father. If he should be unwell, and both Fritz and I away ——"

There was another violent outburst of wailing and sobbing, while Olivia spoke to Mrs. Boyce; and then

Clara Elliston, turning from the bed, fell upon her friend's neck, and murmured:

"I can't be left here. If you go, I must go too."

Olivia thought it would have been more natural had the sorrowing mother insisted upon passing that night alone with her dead child; but all the circumstances surrounding this case were so strange and inexplicable, that Olivia resolved to suspend her judgment. Clara's was the ungovernable grief of a child. It might be short-lived, but it was real, while it lasted. This Olivia saw. As to the rest, she would not hazard conjecture, even in her own heart, until she knew more. For the present moment there was enough to do in directing poor bewildered Mrs. Boyce, and in getting the exhausted hysterical mother back to her home, somehow.

In the cab, she lay shuddering in Olivia's arms, and repeating incessantly:

"Don't tell her. Promise me not to tell her. You shall know everything, dear, dear Olivia — only promise me not to tell her."

"But how did you leave the house without her knowing it?"

"I opened your note, dear, and read it on the staircase. I believe now that I nearly fainted; but I caught hold of the banisters, and aunt was gone on in front. God knows how I had strength to call to her; but I did. I said you wanted me. I told her not to sit up, as I should be some time with you. She asked me why? over the stairs; and I said that your father was ill. Then I softly undid the house-door, and ran — and ran till I found a cab."

The events of that night seemed like a frightful nightmare to Olivia. Now that the necessity for action was past, she felt completely bewildered. She asked no further question; she could find no words wherewith to soothe the convulsed, trembling creature who lay in her arms; she could but stroke the little hand that was clasped in hers, feeling the woman's necessity to offer some sort of comfort.

They found the house perfectly quiet. Mr. Marston was asleep; and so was Mrs. Flaherty, in an arm-chair in the sitting-room. Mrs. Crosbie had retired to rest without a suspicion: the maid of all work was snoring peaceably on her truckle bed.

Mrs. Elliston trembled at every creak her footstep made as she went up-stairs, followed by Olivia. At the bedroom door of the latter, Clara stopped.

Let me come with you. I had better tell you all to-night — my courage might ooze away by to-morrow, Olivia."

She was sobbing still — low stifled sobs, with which the white bosom, bared by her falling cloak, heaved violently. She clung to Olivia for support: she looked up with streaming eyes into her face.

They went in: the room seemed dark and chill. Olivia drew back the window-curtains, and let in the starlight, and sat down on the window-seat. There was an arm-chair at hand, but instead of taking it, Mrs. Elliston fell upon her knees beside Olivia, and the starlight trembled upon her white face as she clasped her friend's hands, and, with a passionate persuasiveness, told her story.

Not as Olivia would have told it — ah! no; and with much that wounded the girl's fine womanly sense and honour: yet was it impossible to look, unmoved, upon that young creature in her misery, or to listen to her self-reproaches, and not try to extenuate something of her past.

"Dearest Olivia, my only friend in the world! don't despise and hate me if I tell you all — all. Oh! I am so wretched! I will hide nothing from you, Olivia, for I know nothing on earth will induce you to betray me. And I am like a poor hunted animal — I know not where to turn for help and refuge. I have no one — no one but you! Aunt Crosbie would turn me out of her doors if she knew — the truth. And when I think of the fearful past, and now of my poor little darling — God help me! — I feel as if I should go mad." It was some minutes before she could continue. "I never loved my husband — never. I married him at seventeen, because I was told. He was making, then, a good income on the stage; but he was consumptive, and soon got too ill to do anything. Then I took to acting, at first by way of getting bread, but I soon got to like it. Elliston couldn't bear that I should act, but we couldn't starve. He got jealous (though he was the coldest husband that ever lived), and then — and then we quarrelled. Can't you guess the rest, Olivia?" she murmured, in a hoarse whisper, after a moment's pause: "A child was born — and it was not his."

Olivia shivered; her first impulse was to withdraw her hands from Clara's clasp; her second was to let them stay there. She was horrified, as any pure-minded girl would be; but her sorrowful pity for the unhappy woman who lay there, her head bowed down upon Olivia's knees, overpowered everything else. For a few moments there was a silence, broken only by Clara's sobs; then she lifted her head, and continued in a voice that trembled with passion:

“There was a man — or rather a devil — whom I then believed to be the soul of truth and honour; he was always after me. I never sang but he was in the house. I never left it, but he came to see me to the cab. And I got at last to watch for him — God forgive me! — and to listen to him when he swore that he loved me better than anything on earth, and he was the cause of all this evil, Olivia.

“Just before the child was born, Elliston discovered everything. It was through a letter he found. He knew he had not many weeks to live. He said he would not disgrace me, would not cast me off; but he never would acknowledge the child, never permit it to bear his name, or to inherit some money that was to come to his son, if he had one. He sent me off to a distant part of London for my confinement, which was kept secret from every one, and when I returned to him he had only a few days left to live. He wrote to all his family, and to my own Aunt Crosbie, who has money of her own, and who he knew would look after me, saying that, as he left no child, his widow had nothing — absolutely nothing. He begged Aunt Crosbie, especially, to be a mother to me, for I was not fit to live alone, he said. That is how I come to be with her. But you see what care he took to prevent my producing the child as a posthumous one — my poor little baby who never did him any harm! Oh! it was cruel, it was cruel to separate me from him; it was cruel to make my life such a constant terror and struggle as it has been! If I proclaimed the child, I knew that Aunt Crosbie and every one of them would give me up. I couldn't make enough to support myself and the child, too. Very often, you know, I've been without an engagement at all; I should have had to go on the streets, Olivia. Indeed, indeed, I'd no choice. Oh! what I suffered at first, when I found myself abandoned by the one person who I thought would have borne all my burdens for me! He had promised to marry me when my husband died. Now he dared to insinuate that I had had other lovers — that he doubted the child being his. I was like a mad creature. I loved him, oh, how I loved that man; and he treated me as a thing beneath his feet. He wanted me to live with him, Olivia. I spurned his offers: I knew how much all his protestations of love were worth. I wouldn't have taken a farthing of his money if it hadn't been for the child."

"You accepted his money?" repeated Olivia.

"How could I help it? Westbrook —"

Olivia started. "Westbrook?" she faltered. "Julian Westbrook? Is that his name?"

"Yes," replied Clara; and then, even at this moment, through her tears, the old acuteness appearing, "I forget if the letter was signed that you picked up; is that how you know the name? It was written long after — only a few months ago, indeed, in answer to a letter I wrote him, telling him about the child."

Olivia scarcely heard her. She had turned deadly cold a moment before; now, the blood seemed all rushing to her brain: she heard Julian's soft honeyed accents in her ear, she saw his eyes bent upon her, as they were that last evening. A shudder ran through her: she never thought of answering Clara's question; she was glad to avoid doing so, indeed. Almost mechanically she said at last:

"So you wrote to him, for money?"

"Not for myself — don't think that, — only for the child's sake, Olivia, only for the child's sake. It's been so hard to keep enough to support it, without Aunt Crosbie's finding it out. I felt, too, that the child had a right to Westbrook's money. I swear I never spent any of it on myself, Olivia; and now, poor darling —"

She buried her head in her hands, but a minute afterwards she continued:

"Oh! when I think of these last terrible three years, and of what his life would have been had he lived, Olivia, I declare I am almost glad to think he is gone from this world of temptation and trouble! He would have grown up, perhaps, to despise and hate me for having brought him into it; and oh! he never could have loved me as his mother, Olivia, as he did that poor woman! And yet was it my fault that I could see him so little? Aunt Crosbie questioned and watched me always so closely — and I was afraid, you see, of giving Mrs. Boyce my address, for fear — oh! how hard life is! Perhaps, Olivia, if I had been with him, or if she had known at once where to find me, my child might be alive now!" and her distress burst out afresh. But the first violence of the storm had abated. Olivia soothed her with such words as she could find; though, if the truth be told, she felt too keenly that no self-condemnation of the wretched mother's could be too severe, for her to be a very eloquent comforter. Nothing — no motive of expediency or prudence, it seemed to her, could justify this abandonment of the child into strangers' hands; and it was, certainly, undeniable that the child might possibly have been alive now, had more prompt help been called in at first. She felt a profound pity for the unhappy woman who lay there at her feet — no unfitting representation, outwardly at least, of the Magdalene. "Perhaps, in her place, I should have fallen too," she said to herself. "Who knows till she is tried? And yet there are things I can't get over. How can she complain of her husband's not letting the child pass for his, and so wrongfully inherit? How can she degrade herself by taking that man's money? Heartless and vicious — oh! Rupert, how right you were about him! How blinded I was!" and she thanked God fervently, as she well might, that her eyes were opened. As to Clara, Olivia could not help feeling, notwithstanding her commiseration for her, that the barrier of feeling which divided them was impassable. If Olivia said what she thought, she would be speaking a language the other could not understand.

Clara's voice, when she spoke again, was as the sighing of a wind among reeds that have been broken by a storm.

"Oh! how often have I longed that my secret and my shame should be buried, Olivia! — buried out of the reach of any; and now all will be buried — but how? My poor child! my poor little baby! I dread the morning — I dread to see Aunt Crosbie — and worse than all, I dread those horrible letters they will write to me about — Ah! I am a moral coward — but don't hate me, Olivia — and you will never, never betray me, will you? You will help me in all this, won't you, dear, with Mrs. Boyce? If I could but go away — far, far away, to some desert island, where they would all forget me, and I should never hear of them again! I am sick of this world — I am weary of life, Olivia. I should be happier if I could kill myself, and then I should rejoin my baby."

"You must not talk thus," said Olivia; "I cannot endure to hear you meet a trial, which should have some abiding results upon your life, in this theatrical tone. Desert islands and suicide do very well for melodramas, Clara. Real sorrows have a higher and nobler end, and so have the sins that are repented of, in a right spirit. I pray to God that yours may lead to such repentance."

She rose as she spoke, and threw up the window. The first streak of grey was in the sky. It was a warm, showery morning; but she heeded not the rain which drifted from the river into her face. She felt a choking at her throat. Did she believe in presentiments? At that moment, in spite of her wish to judge her leniently, to shield and befriend her, if possible, Clara inspired her with a feeling akin to dread. Something seemed to tell her that a time would come when she would suffer many things because of that fair young creature at her feet, and of the shameful secret which had thus, in a manner, been forced upon her. It lay like a stone at her heart: what would she not have given to have lifted and cast it out! They were now bound together by no common tie. Olivia seemed to foresee that a time would come when she would give anything — anything on earth — that no such tie existed.

What passed further between the two, that night, it is unnecessary here to repeat. A quarter of an hour later, Clara Elliston, slipping off her shoes, crept upstairs, and passed her aunt's door unheard.

CHAPTER XXV.

A Woman's Inner Life.

LET us depart from our general plan in telling this story, for a chapter, and follow Clara Elliston during the next few days of her life, that we may gain a better insight than we have yet had into a character so difficult to understand. Was she only a clever actress, playing, at one time, the impassioned artist — at another, the giddy coquette — at a third, the anguished mother? Assuredly not; though, at each of these times, there may have been something in her words and demeanour that partook of a histrionic performance. She could very seldom forget herself. Even when her own feelings were deeply stirred, it was hardly possible for her to refrain from adorning the part by an appropriate gesture or two — from thinking, in short, of the effect she was producing upon others. On first hearing of her child's death, remorse and horror overpowered everything in her mind, and the storm of her sorrow broke over her naturally, and without control; but in the course of her narrative to Olivia, two hours later, I will not undertake to be sure that with her emotion was not blent the thought of how touching she must appear to her auditor — dishevelled hair in the starlight, and a voice, broken by sobs, pouring out its tale of sin and suffering. Vanity, in fine, was the upas-tree which overshadowed all else in the woman's being: whatever of true, and pure, and noble was there had been poisoned by its baneful influence. She had good impulses: she was generous and charitable (though not over-scrupulous, as we shall see, in the getting of money): she was capable of a strong affection — as in Westbrook's case, whom she had loved, and still did love, in her secret heart, most passionately. Yet vanity entered largely into it all. She never saw man, woman, or child, without desiring admiration, gratitude, or praise: if a man, whether old as Methuselah or ugly as Thersites, he must be made, if possible, to fall in love with her. Where this failed, as in Thompson's case, it simply proved that the man was blind — hopelessly, pitiably blind. Her vanity was far too sublime for any petty jealousy: she was really fond of Olivia, and most anxious for her love, and friendship, and commiseration; but as to any comparison between them, it would have seemed to her impossible.

She was very miserable all night. She cried bitterly, and reproached herself about the poor child; and then remembered how red her eyes would be in the morning; and tried to sleep. But she could not, for Nature would have her way, and the tears burst out afresh; and then she thought of Aunt Crosbie, and began to invent some necessary lies for the morrow. Oh, what a hard lot hers was! There were women, not to be named with her, before whom the world fell down and worshipped, who had wealth, and rank, and power, whose love had never shipwrecked them, whose lives were one long triumph. Why was she not born in such a sphere? How smoothly all would have gone with her then! No suffering — no sorrow! Only the force of circumstances had wrought the evil of her life. Other women had no dark secrets, no necessity for lying, no constant struggle with adversity, as she had. She sincerely pitied herself.

Yet what would any other position in this world have done for her? Had she been a duke's daughter, would her insane vanity have been less? — her opportunities for good have been greater? She might not actually have fallen, but would her virtue have been worth much more, if she had lured a dozen men to fall in love with her, and had given nothing in return?

It was not the frame of mind that was likely to yield good results. Her regret for the past was remorse, not repentance. Her self-reproach was more bitter and wrathful than humble unto God; and the concealment of her shame before men troubled her far more than her abasement in His eyes.

She woke from a feverish, uneasy doze about eight o'clock, and started up. The hard grey light of the London morning, unbroken by blind or curtain, was full upon the room. At one spot only it seemed warmed into something like sunshine — where it fell upon a little golden curl that lay upon the table. She had cut it off from the child's head the night before. As her eye lighted on it — bewildered and only half awake as she was — all the terrible truth flashed upon her, and she groaned aloud.

There was a knocking at the door — it was double-locked.

"Time to get up, Clara. Past eight o'clock, and you've got to give a lesson at nine — and there's the rehearsal at half-past ten. Come, up with you! If this is the effects of pleasuring at night, I sha'n't take you out no more."

"Pleasuring at night!" The mockery of those words struck the miserable woman.

"I am ill," she said, from her pillow, and the voice was more than necessarily feeble. "I can't give a lesson, or go to rehearsal this morning—I can't indeed. You must send some one to say so."

"Humbug! None of your shamming. I can tell by your voice it's not nat'ral, Clara. Why, if you'd got pains, like me, all down your legs and across your loins, with rheumatism in the right shoulder, you might talk. You ate a deal of that lobster salad last night, and maybe it gave you a bit of indigestion—no worse than that, I'll be bound. Come, open the door."

"No, I don't want anything. I'll get up by-and-by."

"A black dose will set you all right. No more nonsense, now—open the door."

"I'm not going to open it, Aunt Crosbie, so you may go away."

"You're an obstinate little minx," quoth Mrs. Crosbie; and gave her up as hopeless.

When Clara rose, which at last she felt she must do, she walked at once to the glass, and examined herself carefully. She found that her eyelids were red and swollen, and that she was very pale—quite sufficient reasons, if she had no other, for shutting herself up for to-day. Aunt Crosbie could not doubt the testimony of her eyes, and continue to think Clara was shamming, when she saw her. She swallowed a strong dose of sal volatile, and then dressed herself. But, before leaving the room, she opened her writing-case, took out her purse, and spread its contents on the table — seventeen and threepence! She was already in Olivia's debt; how was she to meet further and necessary demands? As soon strike money from a flint as extract it from Mrs. Crosbie. And then, even at this moment, it does not escape her recollection that the operetta which is now rehearsing at the theatre will require her to have an entirely new costume.

For twenty minutes or more she sat there meditating; then she took out a little miniature — a man's portrait — from her desk, and she cried as she looked at it. After that, she locked away the little golden curl, and wrote the following letter:

"SIR, — The last link in the chain that once bound me to you is snapped. My poor little child is dead. It is right that you should be informed of this; as also that I am utterly without the means of paying all the consequent expenses. The child must be buried like a pauper, and I must remain in debt to the woman who had charge of him, unless you come forward. Mrs. Boyce, 3, Catherine-street, Pimlico, is the address, if you choose to go there. You need not fear that you will be troubled by any further applications from me. Now that my poor baby is gone, for whose sake I took your money (as I told you when you spoke to me the other evening at Exeter Hall), I desire that, if we ever meet again, it may be as entire strangers; and may Heaven forgive you your cruel, heartless conduct towards me, and the slanders by which you have tried to justify it.

"C. E."

This she folded, sealed, and directed to Julian Westbrook, at the Albany; after which she wrote another note:

"You will not see me at rehearsal this morning, I am so unwell; and of course I need not say it is impossible to see me here. I hope in a day or two to be out again; but I must buy myself a black shawl or cloak of some kind, before I appear in public. I am going into mourning. I am very triste to-day, so cannot write more. Thanks for the lilies: they looked so well in my hair last night. I wish you could have seen them.

"Ever yours,

"CLARA ELLISTON.

"P.S. — Take the duet we are learning a little faster, with a rallentando at the end."

The maid of all work was despatched to the post-office with these missives; and we may as well at once state what results they produced. Julian Westbrook did not go to Catherine-street; but he sent Mrs. Elliston a cheque for fifty pounds.

She spent the greater part of that day in turning a black gown, and trimming an old black bonnet; and Mrs. Crosbie, who never paid much attention to the work of her niece's hands, only observed that she was evidently out of sorts, as she never opened her lips to sing, but sat glum in a corner — all the consequence of that lobster salad!

The day but one after was Sunday. Clara did not accompany Mrs. Crosbie to her chapel. She had received Westbrook's answer the night before. She set off for Pimlico in great agitation, as soon as her aunt's back was turned; and having paid Mrs. Boyce a sum sufficient to cover all the expenses of her child's burial, she left everything in her hands. She was deeply affected when she entered the darkened room, and knelt beside the little white bed: she kissed the good woman over and over again; and after that, she hurried home, so as not to be found out.

The next day, Aunt Crosbie's astonishment was great to see Clara setting forth to give her morning lessons in a black bonnet, gown, and cloak. She had been crying half the morning in her own room; the other half she had spent in trying to wash away the traces of her tears.

"Why, who on earth have you gone and put on mourning for, eh, Clara?"

"No one you know — a relation of my husband's," replied she, turning away.

"Well, but — stop. A new cloak — I never — well! Why, it cost five guineas, if it cost a penny. How on earth did you get that?"

"Oh, you've seen it before, only you don't remember. And it's paid for: you needn't be afraid of duns."

Mrs. Crosbie shook her head awfully, as though she were gazing at a pall:

"Five guineas, if it cost a penny!"

Clara looked at herself in the glass, with a heavy sigh.

"Poor Elliston was always fond of me in black; and it certainly suits me."

"Not knowing your husband, I can't say if he was a born idiot," snorted Mrs. Crosbie. "But now that he's dead and gone, the less you say about him the better, if he ever had the folly to think it became a pauper to be dressed up like a countess."

Then Mrs. Elliston, with a toss of her pretty head, turned away, and left the room.

She had spoken the strict truth in one point, at least. The cloak was paid for; but it was not with Clara Elliston's money.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The Beginning of the End.

OLIVIA MARSTON'S position with regard to Clara was now extremely painful. It may be thought that this was in consequence of Clara's confession so affecting her "character," as it is termed. But it was the knowledge Olivia had gained of what I heard a woman once call her friend's "other character" — this was what had shaken to the very foundation the structure of sympathy and interest she had built around Clara Elliston. I think her large-hearted charity prompted her to make many allowances for her fallen sister; and I know that in her desire to strengthen and support that sister Olivia would never have shrunk back, but have stood by her, through good report and evil report, her staunch, unwavering friend. But Clara's neglect of her child, her conduct as regarded Westbrook, her extraordinary powers of duplicity towards her aunt, and last but not least, what Olivia considered her heartlessness in the days succeeding her bereavement, disgusted Olivia beyond measure. Her upright straightforward nature did not comprehend the complexities of a character so tortuous, so inconsistent as Clara's. Because Olivia saw how quickly the impression of that miserable night wore away, she argued that Clara had never felt. Because she saw how bravely and cunningly Clara wore her mask, Olivia came to the conclusion that her quondam friend was, in very truth, nothing but an actress. She was not quite right: women like Olivia seldom are, in their judgments of character. We have seen, even thus far, how often she has been mistaken. And the reader, who now knows something more of Mrs. Elliston than even Olivia (she could not see, as we have the privilege of doing, through the double-locked door into her bedroom), will not, perhaps, think her opinion very erroneously harsh.

We must return to the Friday — the morning after that memorable night — and beg the reader to accompany us into Mr. Thompson's studio. It was two o'clock — the hour at which that gentleman was usually served with some slight refecton at the hands of Mrs. Flaherty in person. Upon this occasion she and the tray appeared with unusual punctuality as the clock struck.

"Set the tray down there," said the painter, without turning his head from the easel.

Mrs. Flaherty coughed: she then cleared her throat: she was an uncommon time in arranging the little table. The fact is, she had something on her mind, of which she resolved to deliver herself, though she should die for it. Casting about her how to begin, she said at last:

"May I make sa bould as to ax, sir, whether ye've seen Misther Marston this morning?"

"No; I don't call so early. What is the matter, Mrs. Flaherty? He is not worse, is he?" and Mr. Thompson now turned round and looked his landlady in the face. He was struck with its expression: it was pregnant with mysterious meaning.

"Faith, then, sir, I shouldn't wonder if he was. The poor ould gintleman is a-going very fast, it's me opinion."

"Well, Mrs. Flaherty?" Thompson saw that the outworks were only reached as yet; and he was impatient.

"Your honour is a friend of the fam'ly, and will eggscuse me spaking, which is a lone but respectable widder, and can't abide to see Miss Marston — as sweet a young lady as ever entered me doors — so thick as peas with the hoighty-toighty young famale as occupies me attic (and if it warn't for her aunt, Mrs. Crosbie, a dacent woman enough, she shouldn't stay), which isn't fit company for the likes o' Miss Marston. I sees a deal, though some folks might think as I keeps me eyes shut, sir; for I says nothing, onless driven. But when it comes to the jinks as she led Miss Marston last night, I can't keep me tongue still, your honour. I must spake to some one, and you, as a friend of the fam'ly——"

"What do you mean by the jinks she led Miss Marston last night?" and Mr. Thompson knit his brows at Mrs. Flaherty.

That excellent woman detailed all she knew, with only such alterations and amplifications as might be looked for under the circumstances. Thus, for instance, she represented herself as never having closed her eyes during Olivia's absence; and the hour of the two ladies' return was stated to be four o'clock instead of half-past one.

"And pray, why shouldn't Miss Marston go to the bedside of a dying friend, and return with Mrs. Elliston — at what hour she pleases?" demanded Mr. Thompson, almost fiercely. You may be sure that, whatever he felt on the subject, he would be careful never to let it appear before Mrs. Flaherty.

"Well, sir, ye see, Mrs. Elliston is that hoighty-toighty — I knows things about her, sir — that makes it *on*respectable, I consider, for the young lady to be cuttin' about o' nights with her."

"What do you know about Mrs. Elliston?"

Mrs. Flaherty unbosomed herself. She knew no actual harm of her attic lodger; but she knew a deal of things that were unbeknownst to Mrs. Crosbie. How the niece received letters, parcels, flowers, and mysterious emissaries, all carefully concealed from her aunt; how she was seen to be escorted in the dusk on several occasions by a handsome young man, who parted from her at the corner of the Terrace; these and minor peculiarities of conduct were dilated on with great unction by Mrs. Flaherty.

"I'm no mischief-maker, sir," concluded the worthy landlady. "It's not me as would go forr to tell her aunt, or make a shindy — it's rightly no business of mine; and I wouldn't be a-spaking to ye now, sir, only forr the sake of the young lady — and you a friend of the fam'ly. There mayn't be harm in Mrs. Elliston — maybe she's only hoighty-toighty — but she's ill consistent company for the likes o' Miss Marston — that's sartain sure."

The painter thanked Mrs. Flaherty. He moreover gave her a very substantial evidence of his goodwill (in spite of the forbidding looks wherewith he had received her discourse). He was sure she was actuated by the best motives, he said. Mrs. Elliston did appear to be a flighty young person, there was no doubt about it; but, as regarded Miss Marston, nothing she did could possibly admit of misconstruction — she was beyond the reach of calumny, let her keep what company she might. Into this particular company she had been brought by her generous womanly pity; and it was evident that a charitable impulse had led her to some sick bedside on the previous night. Thus he glossed over, as best he could, an intimacy which now, more than ever, annoyed him.

He would speak to her. Since it was impossible to address her father on the subject, he would take the privilege of his years (was there not nearly a score's difference between them?) and give her a friend's counsel. Toward dusk he called; but he only found Mr. Marston. He sat nearly an hour with the old man: no Olivia appeared. Anticipating his visit, wearied out with the painful excitement of the past night, and disinclined by the impression that scene had left upon her to converse upon indifferent subjects (even with Thompson), she stole softly from the parlour, when she had read her father to sleep, and went up to her own room. There she remained until, looking from the window, she saw by the light of the street-lamps, now lit, the painter's figure as he left the door.

The next day he was more fortunate. He found Miss Pringle below, and resolutely sat her out.

"Miss Marston," he said, as soon as they were alone — or virtually so, for Mr. Marston had fallen asleep under Aunt Clo's influence — "you said, the other day, you would look on me as your brother's representative, as a real, true friend, not a humbug under that name. Do you remember?"

"I am not likely to forget your kindness."

"You won't think it impertinent, then, if — if I ask you one or two questions on a subject which interests me, as your friend, and if I offer you my advice, as I should if I were your brother?"

She had a presentiment of what was coming. She felt uncomfortable; but her courage rose with the occasion. She begged him to proceed.

"You know I have never liked Mrs. Elliston. You have thought me prejudiced. Things have come to my knowledge, lately, to make me more than ever sure that she is not a fit companion for you."

Olivia was silent. Her cheek rested upon her hand: she moved it, so that it should half shade her eyes.

"I have learnt — no matter how — that you were out with her the greater part of Thursday night. Do you mind telling me where, and with what object, you accompanied Mrs. Elliston?"

"I cannot."

"Understand me. My only object is to prevent your being deceived — being imposed upon — by a woman who is an accomplished actress. She has worked upon your womanly sympathies, I know well. You were induced to go and attend on some one who was ill. Why should Mrs. Elliston insist upon your making a mystery of this? — on its being kept especially from her aunt? There must be some ugly fact connected with it — unknown to you, of course — and it is this I want to get at. I will not allow you to be this woman's dupe any longer."

"I am not so. I know all her history — at least, as much of it as I care to know."

"And you continue to think well of her? If so, I am certain you do not know all her history."

Olivia was at some trouble how to reply. If she confessed that her opinion of Mrs. Elliston was changed, she pointed to a thread from which the whole secret she was bound to keep might be unravelled.

"I do not think Mrs. Elliston's society can do me any harm," she replied, smiling ever so faintly. "But if your friendly advice is to refer to that, I had better say at once that, owing to my father's increasing infirmities, alas! and other circumstances, I shall not be able to see as much of Mrs. Elliston for the future as I have done. I have told her that our Italian lessons must be discontinued, for I feel that my dear father now demands all my thoughts and attention. What do you think of him? Is he not very much changed in the last week or two?"

She asked this with such sorrowful earnestness, that Thompson could not but reply honestly in the affirmative: nor could he turn the conversation back into the channel from which she had wilfully diverted it.

"He will not admit that he is ill — he does not complain of anything; only he is become so feeble — so shrunk and colourless. I have no longer the courage to urge his going out."

"You must make him see a doctor. He ought to have the best advice, Miss Marston."

"Unfortunately he has such a violent antipathy to seeing any medical man; it is hardly possible to persuade him to do so."

"Will you leave that to me? I will bring some one to-morrow, and I think I can answer for it your father will not refuse to speak to him."

He talked to her some time longer: she was sad at heart, and his conversation cheered and strengthened her. But of Clara Elliston there was no word more spoken between them.

He felt baffled and half angry when he left the house; and above all, angry with himself for feeling angry. What right had he to be so? And had he not such absolute trust in Olivia as justified his expression to Mrs. Flaherty, that "nothing Miss Marston did could possibly admit of misconstruction?" His object, too, it was evident, was gained: though not through his means. From whatever cause, the intimacy, he saw, was broken. Olivia no longer hotly defended Mrs. Elliston. With this he must rest satisfied.

He went to Dr. ——'s the same evening, and made arrangements with that learned man, which resulted in their driving together to Mr. Marston's the following day about noon. The painter had not been living under the same roof with, and in the intimacy of, the Marstons for some months, without discovering what rigid economy Olivia was forced to practise, and to what straits she was put in order to hide their reduced circumstances from her father. He knew what a drain upon her slender purse this paying of a physician would be to her. Was it much merit of his, if he, a well-to-do, solitary man, exercised his ingenuity in thinking how he could help a proud and sensitive girl, without her knowing it? In so much as it was a personal pleasure to himself, I think not. Nay, inasmuch as it involved a considerable amount of fibbing, stern moralists will say it was decidedly reprehensible. But this individual had his own views on this and all other subjects. He was often very wrong, no doubt. I am not holding him up as an example to youth. I am telling you what he did; and where I can, and that I see fit, why he did it.

He explained to Olivia that the great Dr. — was a particular friend of his; that he had almost given up practice now, but that, out of regard to him (Thompson), the kind-hearted physician had promised to see Mr. Marston — as a visitor: on that condition only. If, after seeing him once, he should feel sufficiently interested in the case to return, it would be in the light of a friend. The doctor had some curious details of the late accident at Vauxhall, as he had attended one of the sufferers; and with this passport Mr. Marston would no doubt welcome him in the first instance.

And so the event proved: Olivia brought the two gentlemen to her father, and then left the room. In the little dull back parlour, where a bit of the pale blue May sky looked down on her out of the topmost pane of the window, over the dingy backs of houses, she sat anxiously listening to every sound from the next room. She could first catch the familiar words, "Terrible! terrible! you don't say so?" uttered in a feebler tone than formerly, but which spoke of the awakened interest; and then there was the monotonous buzz of one voice, uninterrupted for some minutes. After that her father spoke again; the conversation between the two grew brisker; and she knew that Mr. Marston was answering all the doctor's questions without being aware of it. The interview seemed to Olivia to last hours; and yet when she heard the doctor get up, and bid her father good-bye, when she heard the handle of the door turned, her impatience had died away — her heart sank within her. She stood up, as they entered, and her pale, anxious face told both the men how she tried to read their thoughts.

The doctor spoke his, with tolerable openness, and in a manner that showed he knew that he was not dealing with a foolish and hysterical girl. He told Olivia that her father might live many months — the months might even stretch themselves into a year; but that the springs of life were sapped: there was a general decay of all the powers, which made it impossible that he could ever really rally. He did not say — for it was unnecessary — that he believed the old man's end was not far off: it was enough to have prepared her, and to point to the prudence of urging her father, while his mind yet retained any of its old energy and clearness, to set his house in order. She told him, in her sweet, tremulous voice, that there was no house to set in order — no affairs to be arranged. They had wound themselves up, disastrously enough, some nine or ten months before. In this world her dear father's work for his children was done: no need to trouble him further with any temporal concerns. Dr. — promised to call and see him in the course of a week or two, and then, after giving certain directions as to the old man's treatment, he took his leave.

Olivia sat down and buried her face in her hands. It was as though a great wave had washed over her. And yet she had partly known this — felt the dark shadow gathering around her, for many days past; but it had now taken a tangible form.

She was not alone; but she had forgotten this — forgotten everything except the heavy sorrow which crushed her to the earth. And the friend who stood beside her respected her grief: he said nothing, judging it wiser to let her take her own time — “to speak, or not to speak.” She looked up presently, and saw him there. She held out her hand silently to him.

“I knew you were brave,” he said, in his kind, deep voice; “otherwise he should not have told you. But it was better you should know — it is always better to know the truth, if we can bear it. To meet these troubles unprepared is doubly trying. You have the satisfaction, now, of knowing that what human skill can do to prolong your father's life will be done. How long that may be rests in other hands than ours.”

She tried to command her voice sufficiently to speak calmly.

“I can never thank you enough,” she murmured at last. “Without you, I should never, I think, have got him to see any doctor. Oh, yes, it is better, far better, I should know the truth — besides the comfort of feeling that we are doing all that can be done. God will help me to bear it when it does come, I am sure. At present, I feel, in the words of Scripture, ‘What good is my life unto me’ when he is gone? He was all my thought and occupation, and to him alone was I necessary. In him has centred all my life, ever since I was a little child. No one can tell all that his loss will be to me."

No one, perhaps, but the man beside her. He who had watched the tender reverence, the unremitting attention of that loving child, day after day, felt what the chasm in her life would be; and felt, too, with additional bitterness, his own inability to fill the void.

"Mere friendship," he said, at last, in a low voice, "must be unavailing at such a moment to comfort you, I am aware, but — such as it is, you know, for I have told you so before, that no greater joy can fall into my solitary life than to be of some service to you."

"Ah, you are very kind to me. I am ashamed — no, I will not say that, I am not ashamed of burdening you with my troubles, for I have learnt to know your noble, generous nature, and that you gladly befriend all who have need of you."

"Not all — no! not all."

"Rupert shall thank you some day. I do not think I shall even try and thank you again," she said, with a woful attempt at a smile.

And then they parted.

CHAPTER XXVII.

[Mrs. Elliston Departs.]

ALL that night Olivia turned over in her mind what she should write to Rupert. She was unwilling to bring him home; had not the doctor said their father might yet live many months? Yet she was equally unwilling to leave him in ignorance of that beloved father's critical state. She knew that Rupert would, at any sacrifice, return, if he thought there was imminent danger, and that Olivia might be left desolate. But just because she feared this last reason would weigh overmuch on her brother's mind, the unselfish girl was loth to alarm him. Mr. Claxton was gone to Italy, on account of his wife's health, and was to spend the summer in Switzerland: Olivia was not personally acquainted with the junior partner, or she would have applied to him to know how it would affect Rupert's position in the house, and his future prospects, if he suddenly threw up the business he had in hand, and returned home.

But, by a happy coincidence, the morning's post brought letter from Rupert himself: and thereupon her doubts, poor girl, were speedily solved. He wrote:

"I have brought my business here to a sudden and satisfactory termination: but instead of this sending me home, as I was led to expect, it is to have a precisely contrary effect! In other words, I have proved so skilful an ambassador here (you never discovered the qualifications for one in me, did you?) — a mediator, and pacificator of so much tact (you see, my trumpeter is not yet dead), that I am entrusted by the house with a special mission to California, where it is thought that I may be able, viva voce, to effect more than has been done by a year's correspondence, in a somewhat intricate monetary transaction. I start for San Francisco in a few days, and I confess I rather look forward to seeing the new life there as an amusing change of slide in this magic-lantern of life. There is a fine image for you, Olivia! Seriously, were it not for leaving you and my father so much longer than I anticipated when I set out, I should think this expedition very good fun. My amour propre is, of course, gratified at the opinion my worthy friend Mr. Claxton seems to have formed of my abilities. I am in capital health — never was better in my life. I am told there is no doubt but that I shall be able to get away from San Francisco before the summer is over. I shall be dreadfully disgusted if I can't," &c. &c.

There could be no longer a question as to what line Olivia should pursue. It would be impossible now to recal Rupert for many weeks; nearly twice the time it would have taken to do so from Jamaica. He would be home before the autumn, and Mr. Marston's life might be prolonged another year. How could she have the heart to bring her brother back, just as he had received this fresh proof of the high estimation in which he stood with his employers, — and when he wrote in such gay spirits?

She sat down and told him that her father had not been well — that he no longer walked out — that years were beginning to tell upon him — that Rupert, on his return, would find his father much changed. She told him, in short, everything, except the physician's verdict, and her own anxious, forlorn, and desolate state.

Of that not a word. She spoke of Mr. Thompson's great kindness to them (as she had done, in a studiedly cold way, in all her recent letters), but she found it impossible to make the words express enough, without their seeming to say too much, and in Rupert's suspicious frame of mind there was every reason in the world to avoid that. To her brother, in person, she might have been able to speak of the painter in much warmer terms. She could not have failed to kindle with her theme, I think, and to have pointed out in glowing language the great debt of gratitude they both owed. But written words are different. There is time to reconsider, and to pare down the exuberances of impulses. But, any way, it is difficult to make a brother in California comprehend that the best, the kindest, and the cleverest man you have ever met is — only a friend.

I need but few words to tell of Olivia's life during the next six or seven weeks. Mr. Marston seemed to rally a little under Dr. ——'s care, who saw him twice in that time. The physician wisely held out no further hope to Olivia than he had done at first; he knew that it was but the flickering of the light in its socket, and that the old man's days were numbered.

The daughter's unremitting devotion to her father was sufficient to account for her seeing so little of Mrs. Elliston, though, of course, it could not blind the latter to the real state of the case. It annoyed her. I think she would have done a great deal to regain the interest and sympathy of Olivia. I am sure she would have thrown over that miserable tenor at the theatre (who was so madly in love with her, and with whom she was playing fast and loose), if by so doing she could have won back her place in Olivia's regard. Strange that she should set a value on what, in all worldly ways, was worth so little!

Olivia was uniformly kind in her manner when she and Clara met — but "O, the difference!" She never asked a question, she never proffered her advice, she removed the conversation as far as possible from all personal matter, she was proof against the actress's prettiest poses, and most captivating wiles and graces. Only, when Clara was about to speak, once or twice, of the child, in a melodramatic strain, Olivia stopped her — and somewhat sternly, too. She could pity the woman's whole life-history — she could hardly forgive that chapter.

During those weeks Thompson was daily at the Marstons'. Numberless were the services he found to render to Olivia; and she looked to him more and more for help and for advice. His manner was at times a little constrained; it was always grave and gentle to her, even when tinged with sarcasm towards others; but he set such a watch upon his words, that her conviction of the purely friendly nature of his regard was never disturbed. That he, on his side, should be as much deceived was less surprising. Men are less keen than women to detect and distinguish between different states of feeling. And where gratitude and confidence were so well earned, and the expression of those sentiments so natural, it would have required a more unbiassed observer than the painter was to determine that something yet warmer and deeper lay behind. I call him a biassed observer, because he started with the conviction that Olivia could never care for him but as a friend: let him win a title to her esteem and regard by every means in his power — it was written, “thus far shalt thou go, and no farther.”

He knew of her decision as regarded Rupert, and he approved it. The man’s common-sense view of the case was, that it would be madness to let the brother sacrifice his future prospects, probably, to a mere sentiment; when he could do no good, in Mr. Marston’s condition, by returning immediately, and might materially help his sister, eventually, by remaining where he was. Had the old gentleman expressed any strong desire to see his son it would have been different; but he never did so; nor did he manifest any surprise at his protracted absence. When he spoke of him — which was not often, for he talked less and less, and dozed more — it was in terms of pride at his success, and of expectation that his son would one day be a partner in the house of Claxton and Co. That prospect seemed to afford him immense satisfaction.

One June evening there came a knock at the door, and Clara Elliston entered with a radiant face, into which, nevertheless, she tried to infuse a shade — just a soupeçon — of regret.

“Oh! dear Olivia! Such a piece of luck! My fortune’s made. Scarlatti heard me last night, and has offered me such an engagement, — to tour in the provinces for six months! I’m so delighted — that is, I should be, if it wasn’t for the thought of leaving you. I can’t bear to think of that. But a poor creature, struggling to earn an independence, can’t refuse, you know, such an offer, can she?”

“I should think not,” replied the other, quietly.

"Particularly when she has no reason for doing so. Mrs. Crosbie, I hope, goes with you?"

"Yes — oh! yes," said Mrs. Elliston, with something very like a sigh. "Of course she'll come, and I dare say make herself disagreeable to all the people about one. It can't be helped. Her respectability is such a tower of strength! No one can say a word about me as long as I have that dragon of virtue to keep guard over me."

"You had better not trust solely to that," rejoined Olivia, coldly. "If your conduct gives them a handle, people will talk, whether your aunt lives with you or not."

"Now, I know that odious Mr. Thompson has been talking to you again about me — I am sure of it, Olivia! Your manner is so changed lately. Oh! I see you have been listening to all sorts of vile stories about me — now confess it," and the little widow's eye flashed with angry excitement.

"I beg your pardon. Mr. Thompson and I never discuss you now."

"Why are you so changed, then? Ah! Olivia, I thought you were more generous than to be so severe on me. Haven't I suffered enough?"

"I'm sure I don't know, Clara. It doesn't look much like it. However, I don't pretend to judge you — your own conscience must do that. Only, frankly, our way of looking at things is so different that I can't feel the interest in you I did. However, as we are to part so soon, no good can come of our talking about this. When do you go?"

Clara began crying, as usual, and her face was never disfigured at such moments — her tears were as a gracious rain pouring over lilies and roses.

“Ah! you do not understand me. You are like all the rest of the world — no one understands me, and yet I have taken more pains to make you love me than I ever did before with — with — any woman, Olivia. Are you then so hard-hearted that you cannot forgive the past?”

“I hope not, Clara. I am an erring woman myself. We are told not to judge one another. I try not to judge you — only I don’t understand your way of going on, that’s all, and I don’t think there is any real sympathy between us. You have been very kind to my father, and I thank you sincerely for that, now that you are going away.”

“Don’t talk about that. It is you who have been kind to me,” said Clara; and then added with sudden candour, which was a master-stroke of finesse, in its way, “I know that I am horridly vain, horridly fond of admiration, but oh, Olivia, I had such a childhood — such a bringing up! Your friendship was almost the first good thing that fell into my life, and I looked to it to strengthen and improve me. I didn’t think you would desert me! I thought there was one noble, generous creature in the world who would try and overlook my past sins, and all my present shortcomings enough to bear with me — but every one deserts me — every one! The man to whom I sacrificed myself abandoned me, and now you — the only woman I ever loved, turn from me, and will not hold out to me a hand!”

Olivia was startled by her vehemence.

"What is there I can do for you, Clara? You have your aunt, who ——"

"Oh! don't talk to me about her, Olivia."

"You're very ungrateful. She makes great sacrifices for you. However disagreeable she may be, poor old woman, you should remember that. You can't think it's any pleasure to her (particularly with her ideas about religion), running after you at theatres and concerts, as she thinks it right to do. Even this journey, this tour—with her infirmities, and rooting up all her habits ——"

"Oh! you need not tell me. I know all that, only when goodness is like Aunt Crosbie's, I can't appreciate it; in fact, I think I hate it. I never feel so bad as when she is preaching to me. Olivia, we are going to part, and perhaps may never meet again. I want to take the opportunity, now we are alone, to say something to you. Although you no longer care about me—I hope—I hope you will grant me this one request. Never tell Mr. Thompson—never drop a hint to him of what you know concerning me. He hates me—and some day he may do me a serious injury, if he learns the story of my past. I know what you would say—that you gave me your word long ago not to reveal my secret; but ——" She paused.

"Well? And do you think I am likely to break my word?"

"No; but you may consider it a duty—higher even than keeping faith with me—to tell him this, some day. Wives, it is said, should have no secrets from their husbands. Forgive me. Don't be angry; but it is impossible not to see ——"

"I think you are gone mad," exclaimed Olivia, flushing to her temples. "Your mind runs so much upon these subjects, that you conceive preposterous ideas, without the smallest foundation, about every one around you. As long as we have any intercourse, Clara, I desire you will never again breathe this folly. As to the story of your past," she added, with a tinge of scorn, "it is safe with me, from Mr. Thompson, as from every one else. I have given you my word, and, therefore, you may free your mind of this miserable anxiety for your own safety. As to Mr. Thompson, when you once leave this house, he will trouble his head no further about you. What you are pleased to term his 'hatred' is, in fact, nothing more than his mistrust. Would to Heaven I could remove the mistrust, Clara! But, as I cannot, I hold my peace. Would to Heaven I could think that the story of that sorrowful past, which I will never reveal to any human being, was working in you 'repentance and amendment of life.' Could I think so, we should not now be severed as we are."

Clara sought her old refuge, her stronghold, in tears; and when Mr. Thompson entered, a few minutes later, he scowled rather savagely at the tableau of the little widow-actress kissing Olivia's hands, and weeping over them.

"Mrs. Elliston is going away," said Olivia, looking up into his face. "She is going on a tour into the provinces, for several months."

And two days afterwards she and Mrs. Crosbie, and the canary in his cage, and the pile of old music-books, and several ragged trunks, did actually vacate the attic, and were conveyed by two cabs to the Euston-square terminus.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Night.

It was August. The town was emptied of pleasure-seekers; and, every day, such of its country-loving folk as could afford to take a holiday escaped from their homes, awhile, by rail, or road, or river. Wherever the fields are green, or the water salt, within a day's reach of London, there will you be sure to find some of its citizens, in these burning August days. The steamers, laden with them, passed Olivia's window every hour, bound for Ramsgate, Margate, and such places. She could distinguish fathers and mothers, with troops of little children upon deck, and she saw them, in her mind's eye, as they would be some hours hence, sprawled upon a shingly beach, and lazily turning over the shells and pebbles, which the waves washed up to their feet. She could not always repress a feeling of longing at these times: it seemed as if she only were prison-bound, in the great murky city, and that the very poorest had their breathing spaces in open fields or beside the yet more open sea. She thought with a sigh of pleasant summer days at the Cedars, in the past year that seemed already so far away, of her doves cooing in the hot blue stillness of noontide, of the river — that same river — gleaming between dark arms of stately cedars on the lawn. It was but a transient regret, no more than a physical desire for the peace and freedom of the country. Her heart was where she was; not all the beauty or wealth in the world would have made her leave it; and when she thought of the change that was wrought in herself, when she remembered the blindness that, one short year before, had obscured her mental vision, and imperilled her whole life's happiness, she thanked God that, in his wisdom, he had sent her adversity, and driven her to a poor London lodging from that luxurious home.

In place of that tranquil existence — ruffled for a season by the presence of something she now knew to be worthless — Life, hard, inexorable Life, with its struggles and sorrows, its passions and disappointments, had swept her now into its mighty whirlpool. Never more could she be as she had been: every day carried her further and further from that time, every day brought its hard-fought battle, with patience to suffer its scars and wounds, with less of hope, and more of knowledge, with less of faith in men, and more of faith in God, with less of trust in her own strength, and more of trust in Him without whom no sparrow falleth to the ground.

She was resigned now to lose the old man; she knew that he was passing away from her, peacefully and without pain, and that the end could not be far off. He was going to rejoin her, with whom years ago he had grieved so bitterly to part; to whose memory he had ever remained so faithful. Was it not all gain to him? That good daughter, who, from childhood upwards, had been his companion in joy, his comfort in sorrow, his guardian angel in old age, to her alone it was all loss; and should she repine? She felt that rather ought she to rejoice. He was spared all suffering — all knowledge of evil days fallen on his children — all anxiety for them in the future time. Surely it was a good end.

One golden August morning he tottered into the parlour upon Fritz's arm a full hour later than usual. When Olivia entered, a few minutes afterwards, she found him in argument with Fritz, the old soldier trying, as usual, to get his master, near the open window.

"Si m'sieu foudrait pien s'abbrocher à la fenêtre."

"Qu'est-ce que vous me proposez là?" was the rejoinder, in a tone of feeble indignation. "Par ung pareil temps! Il fait trop froid, je vous dis."

"Ach! m'sieu, il fait joliment jaud — auchourd'hui. Le zoleil fera du pien à m'sieu."

"Il ne faut pas congtrédire la raison, Fritz. Je vous répète, que j'ai les veines glacées."

Olivia motioned Fritz aside. She bade him light a fire; then drew a stool to her father's feet, and sitting there, took his hands in hers, and chafed them. There was a look in her father's face that alarmed her. A change, to which she could not be blind, had come over him since last night; but his senses were clearer and his articulation stronger than she had known to be the case for some weeks past. He thanked her for warming his hands, made his little jest about a daughter being better than a sun sometimes — and asked whether Mr. Thompson had called yet. That visitor was now regularly expected daily — but he often came in several times during the course of the morning, and sometimes before Mr. Marston had left his room. From various little indications latterly, his daughter had seen how constantly Thompson was in the old man's thoughts. It was not what he said; for, true to his character, he said little; but he fidgeted in the morning until Thompson came, and would ask fifty times a day whether he was in the room. Still she was surprised, when he now exclaimed of a sudden,

"Thompson is forty — a very good age for marrying, that. A man has sown his wild oats then. A shrewd man too, I see, on further acquaintance — not to be done by a horse-dealer. And he has a competency. — Well, he is a man I would trust with a good deal — eh, Olivia?"

There was a pause. "I am sure you might trust him with anything, father;" but she said it with less frankness than was common with her: and her cheek was crimson, could he only have seen it.

"Have you heard from Rupert lately?" asked the old man, abruptly.

"Two days ago. I told you at the time, if you remember, dear father."

"Ay — ay — so you did. In California — getting on — getting on — sure to be Claxton's partner in time — with the money he can bring to the firm, at my death. It's possible, you know, Olivia — I say it's possible — that I shall not see him again —"

He stopped. She pressed the hand she held, and said, hurriedly, "Shall I write to him, dear father? Shall I tell him to come home?"

"On no account — why should you, child? He'll find all the accounts square — not a penny owing — he knows that — and he knows all about the dividends. He can take the money out of Lozados' hands now, if he chooses, of course — though I think he'll acknowledge I was right, and that it's as safe there as in the Bank of England. I've nothing to tell him. He has my blessing — you'll give him that. He has been a good son — never given me a day's trouble. Tell him I hope he'll take a good wife to himself — such a one as his mother was — if he can find her like; I never did."

The sun streamed through the half-closed blinds, making an aureole of the silver hair around the old man's temples, as he leant back in his chair. Olivia would not speak. She knew how far his thoughts had wandered, away from the children he was leaving to the wife he was about to rejoin. But, after a while, the thought of that good daughter at his feet returned to him; and he raised his head, saying:

"As for you, my girl, you will be left alone now — and it isn't good for any woman to be alone, I think; look at your aunt Clorinda. You'll want some man to take care of you when I'm gone and Rupert is married. Don't be romantic, and choose a young fellow because he is good-looking, or some nonsense of that kind. Take a man, even if he's past forty, who has a good head on his shoulders, and a good heart in his body, and — and has a competence — and knows the value of money — not a giddy spendthrift. If you know of such a one, Olivia, why you have my leave to take him — do you hear?"

What could she say? She murmured something: she knew not what, and he went on:

"I've a mind to see about it — to speak to — to some one, before I leave you, child. I should be easier about you, if I knew you were in good hands and ——"

"Dearest father! let me beseech you not. Make your mind easy about me; Rupert will look after me, and the rest is in God's hands. Put your trust in Him for me, darling, and do not let your thoughts be troubled about my future."

"You have your mother's fortune, you know — ten thousand pounds, Olivia, in Lozados' hands. — If any designing knave should get hold of it — eh? Now, as I'm sure he is an honest man, I shouldn't mind telling Mr. Thom——"

"No! no! I implore you not. If you would not hurt and distress me beyond all measure, you will say nothing — nothing about me to any one. The person you mean is a true friend — and will prove such, I'm sure, if I need one — when you are taken from me — but he can never be anything more — never. Dear father, let us not talk about me — tell me how you feel."

"Cold — and it's dark — very dark, Olivia — and I've a strange kind of feeling; for my memory hasn't been very good of late — and I've often felt confused — but now, all that I've ever done since I was a boy comes back to me so clearly — I see it all — and your mother, my dear, as she was when I married her — and my follies as a young man, and her patience with me — it seems only yesterday that I upset her in the stanhope. Ah! I was mad for riding and driving — I was a wild blade, until she steadied me, and brought me to business habits. What a wife she was to me! It's weary work being parted so many years — most of all, when it gets so cold and dark, child — that's why I'm not sorry to go — for she is waiting for me there, I know it; and if it wasn't that you'll have no one to take care of you while Rupert is away, I should be very glad to go."

(To take care of her! Heaven save the mark!) She besought him once more not to trouble his mind about her. She bade him remember that with her aunt she could always find a home until Rupert's return. He seemed pacified. His voice had grown very weak again, and she wheeled his chair yet nearer to the fire.

"No warmth," he murmured, stretching his withered hands over the flame. "Shocking bad coal you burn, Olivia — dark — very dark — we had good fires — it was light and warm when she was here — is my journal written? — Mind you write your journal every day, child. Is that Rupert's voice I hear?"

"It is mine, sir," said Thompson, who had just entered, and was speaking to Olivia. He came up to the old man's side, and took one of his hands; and his face confirmed the dread at Olivia's heart.

"Ay — I forgot — Rupert is away; true. But you have been as a son to me for some months past, I think. I shan't be here much longer. I'll wish you good-bye now, and then that'll be done. Look after her a little when I am gone, will you? She'll have no one but her aunt at first, and she's — well, no matter. You needn't squeeze my hand so hard, child. I won't say anything, since you don't wish it. My son will be back by-and-by (he'll be a rich man, some day, mark my words), and he'll thank you for — for everything. Don't send away Fritz, Olivia. Keep him as long — as — you can; then, when he's too old, give him an annuity. Have I said that in my will? I forget — it's so long since I wrote it — but you'll remember it — eh? there's a good child — y, you always were good, from a little thing. The others, who went before her, weren't as good as you. You were always her favourite, Olivia, and now — I shall see her first — well!"

Thus he rambled on, often half inaudible, of the past, of the present, of the future — practical considerations and anxieties for his daughter's welfare, interspersed with memories of a bygone time. Presently, the doctor, who had been sent for, arrived. It was indeed as they feared, and as the old man, happily, himself felt: the end was drawing near. Human skill could no longer ward off the inexorable hand. At Olivia's request Thompson went in search of one of the young curates of the district, who had often been with Mr. Marston before.

He came, and while the dying man was yet conscious, while his voice was yet strong enough to murmur the responses, the service of the church was read in that little parlour, with the August sunlight streaming out upon the river yonder, and sounds of gay music, and of busy life, wafted up from the deck of the steamers into the presence of Death himself.

There was no swift and sudden severance of the bonds that held body and soul together — no heart-wrung words at parting — no moment of supreme and passionate agony. As day slid into darkness, as purple clouds of twilight gathered around the earth, and night came — no one could say exactly at what instant — so it was with the old man. They watched him, hour by hour, as the voice failed, and the breath fluttered more and more feebly; and they saw not it had stopped, until they held a mirror to the lips. Then Olivia knew that the Night was, indeed, come.

Ah, bereaved ones, how could ye support the coming of such Night, were it not for the certain knowledge of a glorious Morning — the morning of a Day where parting is not; neither scorn, nor sorrow; where no fear of future evil shall trouble the horizon, nor mist of coming tears shall veil the cloudless blue?

Farewell, old man: take thy rest there awhile, under the shadow of the cypress thy loving child hath planted at thy feet: all alike to thee now, dry summer's heat, or winter's snow; wild winds of autumn driving the red leaves into heaps around thee, or sweet spring rains, awakening the flowers at thy head-stone into life: thy sleep shall remain unbroken, until that Day when the just and the unjust shall arise, and stand together before the throne of their Father which is in Heaven.

CHAPTER XXIX.

In which a Question is asked and answered.

OLIVIA roused herself during the heavy days that followed, tearless, but with a dead weight at her heart, to do all that was requisite. She sent for her father's lawyer: she wrote a few lines to her aunt. From the latter she looked for little help, little sympathy in her great sorrow. But, indeed, she never thought of herself. All her thoughts were with him who was gone. She wrote as a duty. It would have seemed impossible to her, at that moment, that anything done by a person who was so outside all her deepest thoughts and feelings as her aunt could have power to move her.

Yet the letter Miss Pringle wrote to her niece, while yet Mr. Marston lay unburied, smote the girl like a sword. And its Cheltenham-divine consolations poured no oil into the wounds it made elsewhere.

The letter ran thus:

"MY DEAR OLIVIA, — The news of the sad event contained in your few lines which have just come to hand have shocked me very much. I am sure you must feel the loss of your dear papa deeply. But, alas! we are all mortal, my love, and your parent has paid the debt of Nature, at a very advanced age! You must remember that. It would ill become us to murmur at the decrees of Providence. Indeed, with all your poor papa's infirmities (which I found so greatly increased, the last time I saw him), one cannot but regard it as a happy release which has called him to another world. As the Rev. Mr. Sparshott once observed to me, we must learn to view such events as merciful dispensations. Your well-regulated mind, my dear niece, no doubt does so view your poor papa's removal, and remembering David's conduct on a similar sort of occasion, you do not, I am sure, indulge a morbid grief. And now to turn to temporal concerns. The little that was saved of my poor brother-in-law's fortune goes of course legally to Rupert (and do not forget, by-the by, there are coupons of some shares in the North-Eastern, which poor Mr. Marston always would keep himself, instead of sending them, like every one else, to the banker's). I was going to say that this trifling property Rupert certainly ought — now that he is in a fair way of business, and likely to be a Croesus some day — to give up to you. Indeed, I am sure he will do so, as soon as you can hear from him — so I look upon that as settled. And now, of course, my dear, I shall hope and expect that you will come and take up your residence with me, as your only natural protector; and with our united incomes you may live in a manner more becoming your station than you have lately done. This, I am sure, is what your brother would wish.

“I regret deeply that a catarrh, caught a few evenings ago, confines me to my room; otherwise, you may feel sure, I should fly at once to my beloved niece. But do not be uneasy about me, as Dr. Squills says I shall certainly be quite well in a couple of days. By that time the last sad ceremony will be over, and my mourning will be made. I shall then call upon you — suppose we say on Wednesday at three o’clock? — and I hope to bring you back with me here.

“Ever, my dear Olivia,

“Your very affectionate Aunt,

“CLORINDA PRINGLE.”

Poor Olivia got this letter on the fourth day of her great sorrow. I have said it smote her keenly; it recalled her thoughts violently and harshly to her utter loneliness, with this frivolous little old woman for her only stay and support. She tried to put it all away from her, to forget the letter and its writer; and, in some sort, she did so, until after the funeral.

Then, the day after, the day she expected her aunt to call, she nerved herself to write a note, which she sent by a special messenger up to Bayswater. It was to beg Miss Pringle not to come — not to come for four days. At the end of that time she would leave the lodging she was in — she would go and live with her aunt. She felt she could not trust herself to see Miss Pringle that day, bedecked in bugles and crape flounces; but, not the less, she saw that the sacrifice of her own peace and solitude must be made. I think she never disliked her aunt so much as now she saw herself compelled to live alone with her.

To live alone with any human being whom one can neither honour, respect, nor love must always be a hard trial. In poor Olivia's condition it seemed about the hardest that could have been imposed. Yet she accepted it.

At this juncture, the offer to live with another human being, whom she did honour, respect (and love?), came to her, and — strange inconsistency! — she declined it.

It was on this wise. Mr. Thompson (apparently as a matter of course) undertook all the arrangements for the funeral. He troubled Olivia very little with questions as to her wishes; he knew what they would be. Everything was as simple as possible. Olivia herself followed her father to his grave in Kensal-green, with Mr. Thompson, Mr. Marchbank the lawyer, and Fritz. The old German was deeply moved as they lowered his master's body into the earth, but the pale girl beneath her black hood shed no tear. When all was over, she moved forward, gave one long last look into the grave that held him she had loved so well, and walked slowly away. Mr. Thompson handed her into the coach. He had come with her, but it was evident that he was not going back. He held out his hand, and she took it; but no word was spoken on either side. Neither that day nor the next did he come near her.

She expected him; she looked for him; in vain. She wanted to thank him, which she felt she had never yet done; to tell him all he had been to her, to talk to him about her future, to consult him on sundry small matters, to ask him to write to Rupert; for they must become friends: there was no end of the things for which it was requisite to see him. Before the funeral, he had told her that whenever she wanted him she was to send up to his rooms; but now the door of the first floor remained locked, and its shutters barred, all that Wednesday in which Miss Pringle was to have called, and got her niece's note instead. The lawyer came, and talked over the state of her affairs; but the firm steadfast friend remained unaccountably absent.

What was he doing all that day? Was he walking to and fro "under the shade of melancholy boughs," restless and troubled in his mind, unable to resolve the doubts, the heart-deep difficulties, that beset him? The moment for decision was come. If he hesitated, it was not for himself. He had long felt that here was a woman whom he never could mistrust, as he did most others. He had grown to love her very deeply, with all the singleness and strength of his nature. And that nature had gone through the refiner's fire, since the mere passionate desire for a woman's beauty had wrought his destruction years ago.

But the question was, whether he was justified towards her in taking this step. She did not love him, that he said to himself he knew. She had a true regard and friendship, and so on, for him, as was natural in a girl towards a man nearly double her age. Could he make her happy, if, to save herself from a miserable life of dependence, she consented to marry him? That he, with his experience of life — his bitter experience of married life — should be trying to answer this question in the affirmative seemed strange. Until the last week or two, it had always been a strong and decided negative. Now he began to waver, perhaps with the prospect of approaching separation.

On the Thursday morning, at ten, he came. She was up-stairs, packing her few clothes and books in the great carriage-imperial which had been saved from the wreck, a year before, to bring them hither, when Fritz announced that her visitor was below.

Her heart beat quicker. She went down to him, pale and fluttered at the thought of all she wished to say, and of how hard it was to find words in which to tell what one felt deeply.

"I did not come to you yesterday," he began, "as I knew Marchbank was to be here, and that you must have much to arrange with him; and I thought what I had to say you could listen to better to-day, when you had cleared your mind of any necessary business, than you could yesterday. First, tell me, what further use I can be of to you?"

O. You have been my only friend in all my trouble. I never can be grateful enough to you for —

Mr. T. Don't talk of gratitude. You know I hate the word. What I have done, of course, any man would have done for any woman. I want to do something more, if you'll let me. Let us put false delicacy aside, and talk openly. I suppose your father died badly off, and it is possible you may have some little temporary difficulties about bills, and so on. You know quite well that I am not a poor man — that I have more than I can spend, and no one I care for to spend it on. You say you are grateful to me. Will you do me a pleasure, in return? Will you make free use of my purse — let us say, for the time being — till your brother returns?

If Olivia had spoken with hesitation before, her words came readily enough now.

“I am in no distress for money, thank you. My dear father was poor latterly, and I am poor; but I have enough money to meet every call which this heavy, heavy blow brings with it. Your generous offer ——”

Mr. T. If you won't accept it, we won't talk about it. I hope things are as you say. But where are you going to live, and how? You can't be by yourself, and you're not going to that dreadful old woman, surely?

O. Yes, I am.

Mr. T. You'll be miserable. I know you can't bear her.

O. I can't pretend to be fond of her; but I have no choice.

Mr. T. You'll never be able to stand it. Do you know that there's no slavery — no hell upon earth (he spoke vehemently those words) equal to that of living in the house, day after day, with a woman you hate?

O. (gently). I did not use so strong a term. I have only no love for my aunt, and I have lived in the same house with her. Besides, my brother will be back in a few months.

Mr. T. Your brother may marry.

O. (after a pause). I can always go out as a governess, you know, if I find my life with my aunt insupportable.

Mr. T. A governess's life, in nine cases out of ten, is worse than a servant's.

What could be his object, Olivia asked herself, in thus cruelly painting in the blackest colours each probable future for her? She was silent; and he continued, but with a hesitation foreign to him:

"You say you do not love your aunt: could you bear better to live with any one else, for whom you may feel some degree of regard — with me, for instance? I see the question takes you by surprise. Don't answer in a hurry. "I'm old — too old for you, I know. I am not likely to be attractive to a girl; but you have known something of me, now, for five or six months. I have known something of you for even longer, watching you daily in your life here, before chance brought us together. Shall I say chance, or call by a better name than we apply to hazard that which may result in our mutual happiness? It rests with you. If you think I have the power of making you happy, say that you will marry me, instead of going to your aunt."

Not a word of love — of that sort of love which a girl of two-and-twenty has a right to look for from the man who asks her to be his wife! It was a strangely worded proposal; and yet it scarcely seemed so to her who listened. She never, for a single instant, had supposed that he cared for her; and she was not now undeceived. For one thing flashed, clear and indubitable, upon her: her dear, dead father, taking advantage of some moment when she was out of the room, had, after all, spoken to him. The old pride, far down in her heart, took fire. A little flush came into her cheek, and she sat there, for a moment or two, silent.

She told herself in those few seconds what her secret heart of hearts knew long before, that she could love this man as his wife, and place her future blindly in his hands. But did she not know in what light he regarded marriage? — how he loathed that “thralldom” against which he had so often railed? Did she not know that he was asking her to be his wife only out of a chivalrous pity? No, it was impossible; she could never accept this sacrifice. She could never marry him under such circumstances as these.

“I thank you from my heart.” She shook her head. “No; it cannot be. You have been faithful to him unto the end, and even beyond it. I am very grateful. I respect and honour you more than any one I have ever known. I think any woman should be proud to be your wife; but there are many reasons why I cannot marry you. Do not make me say more. I know all that prompts your generous heart to urge this, but indeed it cannot be.”

Mr. T. Understand me. I never expected — I have no right to expect — that you should love me with the passionate feeling you might have for a younger man. I am content to accept something less than this, Olivia, if you can make up your mind to marry me. You are silent. Are you thinking of what I have often said against marriage? Do you know that latterly the thought has occurred to me, that perhaps Providence cursed me in my youth, in order that I might the more worthily appreciate an angel of consolation in my old age?

“I hope you will find one — I am sure you deserve it,” stammered Olivia, but in so low a tone as scarcely to be audible.

There was a long pause. She kept her eyes fixed on the carpet, but her heart beat so loud and quick that she fancied he must hear it. He watched her keenly; he thought he read her through and through. At last, in a saddened voice, he said:

"Forgive me, if I have pressed this too soon upon you. Take your own time before you give me a reply. I have not forgotten how recent your sorrow is, and I would not have spoken now, but that I foresaw you must come to some decision speedily about your future. I can understand that your heart is too much crushed at present to turn at once to new ties and interests. But let it have time. Think over this matter quietly during the next few days. Only don't bind yourself over, body and soul, to your aunt."

"I go to her on Saturday," she sighed; and then stopped. After a minute she continued: "But you must not remain in any suspense about my answer. A month hence it would be the same. You must not think it is because of my dear, dear father's death that I will not say 'yes.' You see I am quite calm. I can turn my thoughts to anything, since the chief thought, and occupation, and joy of my life are gone. Time cannot affect my loss, I think, since God is good, and enables me to bear it so well now. Years hence, there will still be the empty chair there."

"But others will be filled, and drawn yet closer," thought Mr. Thompson. "Here speaks the warm filial heart of youth, but kind Nature is wiser." He only said:

"Shall I write to your brother?"

O. Yes, do. Tell him all. I mean all — all about our dear father, and what he said to you in his last illness. Rupert and you must become friends. We never can repay all you have done for us, you know.

Mr. T. And about you? Shall I tell him ——

O. Nothing, if you please. Of course I have written to him all that is necessary. He will know I am gone to my aunt, and will be free from anxiety about me. Dear Mr. Thompson, say nothing more in this matter. Be my friend still, and do not object to my feeling grateful — deeply grateful to you.

Mr. T. Answer me one other question, and then I am silent. Does any other and stronger feeling prompt you to refuse me? In short, have you ever cared for any one else? If so, tell me, and I will say no more.

She hesitated. She could not say “no.” Yet she felt that her reply conveyed an expression wide of the truth, when she answered:

“Perhaps I once cared for some one — at least, I thought so then; but he proved unworthy any woman’s true love. Since that time I have had no delusions — have built no day-dreams, but lived in the actual present.”

Upon which Thompson’s mental comment was, “She cares for the blackguard still, whoever he is. She thinks she has forgotten him. She even thinks she despises him. If he were to come back to her to-morrow, she would forgive him everything. Poor child! . . . As for me, it is but one more wreck in my life. What matter? I took care not to let her see — she never will now — how much I cared for her. I wouldn’t let her know it, to grieve her, for the world. Fool that I was, to think it possible that the sun should rise in my life once more. Black — black for ever.”

He looked so gloomy and stern, as he sat there, pondering thus over what she had said, that Olivia would have given worlds to have added something — she scarcely knew what — something that should neutralise the effect of her words. She did not dare. He got up presently to go, and held out his hand in silence.

"You will come and see me in Ormsby-crescent?" she said, in a pleading way.

"I will; and if I can do anything, remember you write to me."

"But where? You are sometimes a week without coming here."

He took up a pencil and wrote — "H. T., Post-office, Westbridge, Berks."

"I shall always get that immediately," he said.

She felt a passing curiosity to know why he lived so far from London, and why he should have his letters directed with his initials only, and to the post-office, too; but her heart was too full and heavy, to dwell long on such things. She saw him go away, and then, when she had watched the last of that dear, honoured friend, behind the drawn-down blinds, as he walked away, she locked the door, and flung herself on the sofa, and buried her head in the cushions. She thought she had done what was right; but she sobbed bitterly now that it was done.

CHAPTER XXX.

Life in Ormsby Crescent.

ON Saturday, at eleven, Miss Pringle called for her niece. Fritz, with certain heavy luggage, was to follow next week. Touching him, Olivia had been undecided what to do for some time, grieving greatly to part with the faithful old servant, yet fearing that in her aunt's small establishment there might be no room for him. To her surprise and pleasure, Miss Pringle settled the question, by saying:

"Fritz, of course, is coming with you? Now that we are two, we shall want a man — to go out with us, and so forth — and instead of hiring a waiter for my little parties, why there he'll be; and if you pay his wages, why his feeding won't cost very much, and there is a fold-up bed, in the pantry, he can have. He looks a little shabby now, but with all your poor papa's clothes he will look quite respectable again. But what are you going to do with all this furniture, my dear?"

"It is to be sold. Mr. Thompson thinks he knows some one who will take it all at a valuation."

"Who's Mr. Thompson? The man with the beard, I saw here, one day? Take care he doesn't cheat you, my dear. Some chance lodger in the house, ain't he? You can't be too careful about money with such people."

"Mr. Thompson is by far the kindest friend we have had since our troubles. He is the most thorough gentleman, the best and noblest man I have ever known, incapable of ——”

“There — there, my dear, that’ll do. You needn’t get so red about it. I dare say the man is vastly honest — only you know nothing about him. If I remember right, he’s a painter or something, eh? and has only got a room here? You don’t even know where he lives. All that isn’t exactly calculated to inspire confidence; and in money matters — there! there, I won’t say another word, since I see it makes you so angry — only if the sale realises less than you expect, don’t say I didn’t warn you.”

What Thompson really did was to ascertain the cost price of every stick of furniture from Holland, who had furnished the Cedars for Mr. Marston, and adding fifty pounds to the sum thus calculated, which was as much as he dared do, without detection, to hand it to Olivia, with the observation that his friend was delighted to possess the things at so reasonable a valuation.

The first days with her aunt passed over well enough. Miss Pringle, according to her limited capacity, had always been fond of her niece, and provided she had things her own way, and could manage at least two-thirds of her niece’s expenditure, she was now likely to be quite content. As far as Olivia was concerned, Miss Pringle was quite welcome to do this. How much of that small income was to go towards the household, how much was to be laid aside for her dress, were questions of profound indifference to Olivia, but on which her aunt dilated at great length. Olivia only stipulated that she should retain control over a certain sum which was to cover Fritz’s wages, and to meet any small charities unquestioned. As for the rest, her aunt might spend it all as she liked. Olivia felt too heart-weary, too sick of money questions and addition sums, not to be thankful that her aunt should take the trouble off her hands.

Thus, for a few days, things went on smoothly. Miss Pringle kept up her perpetual cackle, it is true, unchecked by poor Olivia's pale face, and utter want of response or interest in the purling flow of her aunt's discourse. But nothing that was very actively painful or wounding to Olivia occurred, and she began to think that she might, in time, get accustomed to the little irritating gnat-bites her aunt's unceasing tongue inflicted. She had a small pleasant bedroom looking to the back, over a bit of garden and a tree; and then a row of tiny villas, with more gardens in front of them; and a winding road, and the canal. And boats in the early morning, with boys full of health and glee, came a-rowing down the canal; and barges all day long passed under the bridge there, and kept the scene active with a still yet busy life. And out there, to the left, they were building a new row of houses, and Olivia watched the builders, day after day, till she grew to feel a sort of interest in the progress of their work. Then there was one smoky little sparrow who eyed her suspiciously from the end of a brown lilac-bough, with his head on one side, for many mornings, until the attraction of bread-crumbs proving too strong, he lighted on her window-sill, head more on one side than ever, hopped — tweaked — twitted — flew away — came back — finally grew bold, and at the end of a week was eating out of her hand. She could not read just then — she could not fix her attention on the letters before her when she tried, and this sitting at the little second-floor window, in the grey autumn mornings, and stealing up for half-hours during the day, away from the ceaseless windmill down in the drawing-room, was a real relief to the poor girl. It was strange, but she found her thoughts could often thus be drawn away to sights and sounds without, which obstinately resisted every other effort to change their current.

Miss Pringle went out daily, in a fly or in a bath-chair — rarely afoot. Olivia walked occasionally in the little semicircular paddock beset with a gravel path and privet-bushes, which was dignified by the name of the Crescent Garden, and for which each dweller possessed a key, and sent his children, with their attendant satellites, to walk there, safe from guardsmen and omnibuses. But for those drawbacks, the privilege of perambulating that mangy bit of turf would scarcely seem worth a great deal, particularly when the glorious old gardens of Kensington were within a quarter of a mile. But there is another reason why the dwellers in Ormsby-crescent and such-like favoured localities cling tenaciously to their rights. We are eminently an exclusive people, from the highest to the lowest. What is open to all the world we are tempted, like Peter, to call “common and unclean” — though it were to come down straight from heaven in a sheet. Olivia remembered to have seen little embryo dukes and duchesses playing with the sons of marchands in the Tuileries or on the sands of Trouville. Here, she found that, even in the aristocratic enceinte of Ormsby gardens, the children of Mr. Quintus Smith were not permitted to associate with the children of Mr. Sextus Brown. Olivia pitied those lonely little Smiths, parading up and down, dull and stately, and longing with wistful eyes to join the romps of those riotous, ill-bred little Browns, whose grandfather was a cheesemonger.

It was walking here, late one afternoon, the week after she came, that Thompson joined her, stood at the gate, and asked her to let him in. Here it was that he delivered up to her his very false statement of what her furniture had "fetched;" that he questioned her as to her new life, and her capacity for enduring her aunt's society. Olivia had every motive for making the best of her position. She was happier, she said, than she could have expected. Her aunt meant very kindly: their ways and thoughts were not the same, it was true; but Olivia had many hours of the day to herself: this part of the town was quiet, and the air very fresh; in the early mornings it was almost like the country; she had peace and comfort, and many blessings to be thankful for.

He walked up and down for three-quarters of an hour with her. It was then quite dusk. They left the garden together; and he went his way, promising to call again before long.

How much good that hour had done her! How much stronger and braver she felt to bear her daily burden after talking with him! She went into the house, almost cheerfully, and found her aunt, not yet unhelmeted after her drive, standing at the drawing-room window.

"Pray, who is that I saw walking with you in the gardens opposite? I could scarcely believe my eyes, Olivia."

"It was Mr. Thompson."

"What, the artist man? Followed you up here? And you walk alone with him in the Crescent Garden; and almost in the dark, too! Really, I'm surprised at you, Olivia!"

In her ignorance of such etiquettes, she was unaware of the heinousness of the crime she had committed.

"What will the Quintus Smiths say at seeing my niece acting in such an extraordinary manner? At Malvern, or Cheltenham, or Bath, it is different; but here, in London, such a thing is never done. And you in your deep mourning, too! And in such spirits that you won't see any of my visitors when they call, but run up-stairs directly. Really, I am surprised."

"I don't know what there is to surprise you, aunt, in the fact of Mr. Thompson's calling here, and, on seeing me in the garden, of his joining me. We had business to talk over, and I preferred walking there to sitting down here. I am sorry if it shocked your sense of propriety. I will take care not to offend so again."

"That is right, my love. I assure you it might most seriously damage your prospects to be seen with — with that sort of person. If the Quintus Smiths hear of it — as I dare say they will through their nursemaids — I must try and explain away the circumstance as well as I can."

"I beg you will say nothing but the simple truth, aunt — that I was with a very intimate friend."

"It is a thing," said Miss Pringle, reflectively, "that I don't ever remember to have done, even in my wildest days — walk with a man in that sort of way in a public place."

"I should have thought the more public the better," observed Olivia.

"Not at all. I won't say that I may not once have walked on the Pantiles at Tunbridge Wells with Colonel M' Connor, when my papa left me there, being sent for to speak to his Majesty. But I remember feeling very uncomfortable, and so did the colonel, I am sure — being a man of much delicacy — and he hardly opened his lips, which showed how much he felt his position; and he had the good taste to retire immediately my papa returned. I only name this circumstance to prove to you how unusual it is for young women in England to do such a thing."

Olivia was silent. She got up to leave the room. Suddenly Miss Pringle cries out, "Oh! oh! by-the-by, and about the sale of your things? What has this Mr. Thompson done, eh?"

"They have sold for double what I expected, thanks to the trouble he has taken about them, I am sure. They realised 330%."

"Dear, dear! You don't say so? Who'd have thought it? And what are you going to do with the money, now? How are you going to invest it? If you'll take my advice, you'll —"

"I have already asked Mr. Thompson to do what he thinks best with it, for me."

"Well, I think you might have consulted me first. To give up the management of your affairs, in that way, to a perfect stranger, instead of coming to your nearest relative! A chance lodger in the same house, who makes himself useful, probably with some ulterior motive, and who may pocket your money and walk off with —"

Olivia shut the door which she held half open, and walked up quite close to her aunt. She was a shade paler than usual, and Miss Pringle saw at once that she was very angry. Now the rare anger of quiet people always produces great effect.

"Understand, aunt, that if you and I are to live together, you mustn't speak of Mr. Thompson in that way. This is the second time you've done so, and I can't stand it. After all he has been to us, it is too painful to hear him spoken of as you have done; I feel as ashamed as if he were here, and could hear you. My dear father was very fond of him — had the greatest confidence in him; and I never can say what he was to us during that last illness. I hope he will come here very often, and if you can't receive him with civility I shall always see him alone; I don't care what all your friends say. I would sooner not remain an inmate of your house than give up my friend."

Her voice trembled, and her cheek flushed, as she finished speaking.

Miss Pringle was cowed, as ancient little domestic tyrants are apt to be, by the unwonted aspect of wrath and rebellion. Olivia's spirited reprisals did Aunt Clo all the good in the world (for the moment, at least). They made her quite nice and pleasant.

"My dear, I'm sure I wouldn't say anything to wound you for the world; and I'm sure I know nothing against the man. After all, what you tell me about the sale sounds vastly honest and straightforward, I'm sure; and if he has been so kind to you, I can understand your taking a sort of a — an interest in him. But you must forgive me, my love, if, with my knowledge of the world, I am just sometimes a little — a very little — suspicious. All men are not as trustworthy as this person seems to be.”

“Certainly not,” said Olivia, loftily.

“You remember my telling you about that attorney at Bath, and my box of deeds which he stole? Well, now, that man — I am sure I would have trusted anything, my very person, in his hands! I should have considered my honour safe with him — and he cruelly, heartlessly robbed me, Olivia!”

“I am sorry if your experience has led you to mistrust people generally,” replied Olivia, nothing mollified; “but as I have had abundant and solid reasons for trusting Mr. Thompson, your maxims do not apply in this case.”

And without listening to anything more from her aunt, she left the room. Then, when she had got upstairs and had locked her door, she burst into tears.

Miss Pringle’s reflections, meantime, as her mind recovered its equipoise a little, were somewhat on this wise:

“Bad business, very; evidently the girl is in love with the man, or something very like it. I won’t have him coming here, if I can help it; but a great deal of tact must be used — a great deal! It would be the ruin of all my little plans if it were to get about that she was hand and glove with a low man of this sort! Dear me! Mrs. Quintus Smith wouldn’t hear of her nephew — hm — I should think not, indeed! If the foolish girl spoils her market, now! Suppose I see the man myself? I must proceed with caution, however — hm — watch the game — hm — and act accordingly.”

After a while, turning the tap of her imagination on to other contingencies, she poured out inaudibly:

"Five thousand a year clear! She can't be such a fool as to refuse him, if he proposes, that's to say. Only seen her twice, never spoken; but Mrs. Quintus says he's desperately smitten. I've told her he must have a little patience; it would ruin everything else! House in Portman-square — hm; I shall take a lodging in Seymour-street, and dine there most nights, and have my rubber. Small place in Berkshire — hm; can go to them there in August. Suppose I shall have to be godmother to one of the girls — hm; rather a bore that — silver mug — no, I can leave her my topazes — that'll do. Bless me! with so many advantages she can't think of refusing him, though he has got such crooked legs, poor young man! Well, it ain't of so much importance now, since pantaloons and silk tights are gone out; but in my day — and then, he's a sweet disposition, I'm sure — twist him round my little finger; and really with her temper — for Olivia has got a temper, I see — oh! it's a perfect match! there isn't a single drawback that I can see — except the legs."

Thus Miss Pringle built her Spanish castle upon scarcely more solid foundations than did La Fontaine's milkmaid.

Nothing, in all human probability, could have built the walls of that castle very high. But Miss Pringle, in her manœuvres, made a fatal caracole, as we shall see, and down came basket, eggs, and all!

CHAPTER XXXI.

Miss Pringle receives a Visit.

PEACE was re-established between aunt and niece. Miss Pringle went great lengths to show that she had been made a convert to the true faith — in Mr. Thompson. She constantly alluded to him in a light, airy sort of way, as though there were no difficulty or unpleasantness in approaching the subject. She even inquired what remarkable pictures he had ever painted, and spoke of art with condescension, as of a thing that deserved encouragement.

"But there is no one alive now like Sir Thomas Lawrence! Sweet portraits his were! There was one of a lady in a crop with a black spencer that was thought vastly like me. Indeed, when it was engraved, it was wonderful the numbers that were sold, in consequence. Does Mr. Thompson take portraits, my dear?"

"I really don't know."

"I might perhaps get him some patronage, if he does; I should be so glad to assist him. Mrs. Quintus Smith was talking, the other day, about having her children taken. Sweet woman, Mrs. Quintus Smith. I wish you would call with me there to-day."

"I had rather not, thank you, aunt."

Thompson never called at hours when he was likely to meet other visitors. He generally came at dusk; and the first time after the memorable garden interview, and the consequent scene between aunt and niece, Miss Pringle remained in the room the whole time, and, indeed, monopolised the conversation. This, of course, was not to be endured. Olivia told her aunt, with some heat, that she had matters of business to discuss with Mr. Thompson, and wished, when he called, to see him alone. Miss Pringle would fain have remonstrated, but after her experience of the other day she knew it would be in vain. She must have recourse to other tactics.

Sometimes he came early in the morning. On one occasion, the ladies were still at breakfast when there was a ring at the door-bell, and Olivia heard the voice she thought the richest melodious on earth inquiring for her. She went upstairs with him. After they had discussed some small matters connected with Mr. Marston's affairs, he said, abruptly:

"You do not look well. Does your life here —"

She turned rather impatiently towards the window, and he left his sentence incomplete. She did not choose that he should know what she suffered, or what she had to endure on his behalf.

"I am not so strong as I was, perhaps; but I am not ill. Small things worry me, from my nerves having been overtaxed. I suppose it is very foolish."

"Do you remember what I told you?" he said, in a lower voice, and drawing near her as he spoke. He took her hand. "If you find this life unendurable, as I predicted, if there is no other outlet open to you —"

She felt herself trembling, and withdrew her hand quickly. She was still looking out of the window, over the privet-bushes and yellowing lilac-trees of the Crescent Garden. She spoke rapidly.

"My life here is not unendurable. You must not think so. You see me at my worst whenever you come here. You are connected with so much — with all the dear memories of him — and of my happy, independent life, down there, with no other will or pleasure to consult but his, that the contrast seems always stronger, I think, when you are here. But, just because of that, your visits are such a comfort to me. You can understand what I have lost. My aunt never cared for him, you know. So I can never talk about him now. Ah! he had such a brave, patient heart," she added, with a sob. "I often feel what a lesson he is to me!"

He saw that she was over-excited — that something or other had probably gone wrong. He would fain have comforted her; but delicacy forbade his probing the wound which she chose to hide; and he acted more wisely in turning the conversation gradually to indifferent subjects. The soothing effect of his voice had wonderfully restored her calmness, before he got up to wish her good-bye.

They were the last words she heard from his lips for a very long time: so long, poor child! that her heart and her pride would fairly have given way, could she have foreseen that long separation.

One Sunday morning, some little time after this, the spirit of prophecy descended on Miss Pringle; and she wouldn't go to church. "Something told her" that Mr. Thompson would call. He had been once before on a Sunday morning; and now he had not been for several days. Olivia, not being prophetic, went to church alone.

Miss Pringle on the drawing-room sofa, with her back to the window, but so close to it that she could look down the crescent, under the half-drawn blind, sat with her Bible and Prayer-book before her, and her mind hatching a deep-laid plot.

On Sunday mornings this remote stronghold of gentility was always very quiet — you could hear a single footfall on the pavement of the crescent; and towards twelve o'clock one came along. Miss Pringle looked out underneath her blind.

"It's him!" (Shades of L. M. forgive her.) There is a ring at the bell.

"Tell the gentleman to walk up," screams Miss Pringle over the banisters, and scuttles back to her sofa, where she appears absorbed in her Prayerbook when Mr. Thompson walks in.

He bows, and looks round for Olivia.

Miss P. Delighted to see you, Mr. Thompson. Pray be seated. My niece is at church; but you will not mind paying me a little visit, I hope? I have been so anxious to see you, to thank you personally for all your kindness to my dear niece and her poor papa; and I wish I could show my gratitude in any way — for, indeed, I regard Olivia quite as my own child, now.

Mr. T. Don't mention it, ma'am. (Query, the gratitude, or the fact last named?)

Miss P. Though, of course, I need not observe I was many years younger than her poor mother. However, she is now under my charge, until she marries, which her brother and I have every hope she will soon do. (Waits to see the effect of this coup.)

Mr. T. (slowly). Indeed?

Miss P. Yes; there is a person who has been long attached to her.

(Mr. Thompson does not move a muscle; but his heart grows cold and heavy within him. He thinks of Olivia's last acknowledgment: he feels his chance dwindling to the slenderest thread.)

"And when she knows this," continues Miss Pringle,

"when she knows of this long attachment, we have every reason to hope she will marry, as the match is an unexceptional one in all ways, and one which will give her brother and me the greatest satisfaction. In the mean time we are anxious to do everything that is most to her advantage, and to sever her as much as possible — you understand? — from — from — associations with the past. Her mind is in a sadly morbid state, poor child!"

Mr. T. Humph! She struck me as looking worried when I saw her last.

Miss P. Ah! that was in the garden, wasn't it? No — by-the-by, you have seen her twice since last week. That reminds me to say something to you, Mr. Thompson, which I'm sure you've too much good sense, and right feeling — eh? to mind. I wouldn't wound you, I'm sure, for the world! A person to whom we owe so much — and Olivia is so warm-hearted (young and enthusiastic creature!) that she wouldn't tell you herself — but it doesn't do exactly for her to be seen walking with you in the garden, or to receive you here alone; people will talk, you know — and, indeed, I scarcely know how to say it — it does seem so very cold and ungrateful, now, doesn't it? — but I confess that I think it would be better if you didn't call here at all, just for a time. You understand, eh? She never would tell you herself, I am sure, never; but you see, in my position — eh?

Mr. T. (with a half-smile, though he is in truth sad enough). Yes; I see.

Miss P. Disadvantageous to her.

Mr. T. (as before). Ah!

Miss P. Militate against her prospects. People, you see, will talk.

Mr. T. Ah!

Miss P. And in your position, especially — you understand? Besides which, it keeps the thing alive.

Mr. T. Ah! What thing?

Miss P. Why, you know, her papa's death, and his long illness, and all their miserable life down in that place, there. I want her to try and get over it all, and to begin to mix a little — eh? I'm sure, as a friend, you agree with me. And you won't betray me? The dear girl would be wretched if she thought I'd discouraged your coming here; for, as she always says, she feels deeply grateful to you, Mr. Thompson, and so, I'm sure, do I; and if I could get you any orders I should be so glad. What do you charge, by-the-by, for half a length? — for I suppose you do take portraits, eh? and I have a friend —

Mr. T. You're too kind; but I only paint the faces I take a fancy to.

As he has a habit of always looking straight into the eyes of the person he addresses, Miss Pringle blushes, and looks down, and simpers.

Miss P. Well, Mr. Thompson, if it were particularly to oblige you — some day or other — if you wanted a model to sit for a head — only a head, of course —

Mr. T. You would let your niece —

Miss P. Gracious! no! I — I never could hear of such a thing; I — I misunderstood you.

Mr. T. The gentleman might object, you think? What could he fear from a poor middle-aged artist, Miss Pringle? Particularly after Miss Marston had consented to marry him?

Miss P. Well — hem! — you see, she has not yet consented to marry him, and there might be an awkwardness. People will talk, Mr. Thompson.

Mr. T. You are right. . . . Why did he not propose to her long ago?

Had Miss Pringle given the obvious reason that the young man had only seen her niece during the last month, it would have made all the difference to Mr. Thompson's peace of mind for many and many a day. As it was, she did not know how much hung upon her answer; but her love of rousing the truth and her good star favouring her, she was led to say that which confirmed her hearer in the false impression that the man Olivia loved was the man who was now about, tardily, to come forward and say that he loved her.

Miss P. Well, perhaps he didn't think he'd any chance. It was not until poor Mr. Marston's death — eh? — you understand? Olivia was always so devoted to her papa — never gave any one a chance, you see; but with him it was quite a case of love at first sight — oh, quite; I have reason to know that. And I am inclined to think that she, too — humph! — you understand?

If Mr. Thompson did understand, and believe, it was because of Olivia's own words; not by reason of Miss Pringle's "nods, and becks, and wreathed smiles."

We men are great idiots in such matters. Here was a clever fellow drifting headlong upon a quicksand of which the mother-wit of a very ordinary woman would have steered her clear.

"So that," pursued Miss Pringle, after a long pause, during which her visitor seemed lost in thought, "so that, my dear sir, under the circumstances, I'm sure you'll forgive what I said at starting, eh? I want to get my dear niece out of a vein of melancholy thought as much as possible — morbid, you know, decidedly morbid — and old associations, eh? I think the less she sees just at present of those who remind her of her poor papa, and that miserable life down there — in What's-his-name Terrace by the Strand — and so on — why, the better; and so you'll forgive me, I'm sure."

Mr. T. There is nothing to forgive, ma'am, that I know of. You are a wise aunt in your generation, and view the question all round like a woman of the world. If I ever have had it in my power to be of the smallest service to Miss Marston, I certainly have that power no longer. There can be, therefore, no reason why I should come here any more, and a good many why I should stay away. You are quite right.

Miss P. Nay! But, my dear sir, pray believe me —

Mr. T. My dear madam, is it not enough if I follow your wishes, without entirely believing you? You desire your niece's welfare, and you wish to get rid of me. I believe those two facts devoutly. It so happens that they coincide with certain impressions — certain beliefs of my own — as to what is best in this case. And it is because I believe it to be best, that I shall do as you wish, and come here no more.

Miss P. Dear me! how sensible you are! How very sensible, my dear Mr. Thompson! I'm sure I needn't tell you that Olivia's gratitude and mine, for all —

Mr. T. No; you needn't speak of your gratitude, my dear madam.

Miss P. And if there's anything in the world we could do for you —

Mr. T. You don't happen to have ten pounds in the house?

He looks at her without the shadow of a smile. There is a pause.

Miss P. Ten — ten? You? — eh? Dear, oh, dear! how unfortunate! Had I known — but Sunday — Sunday, you see — one never has any money in the house!

Mr. T. Ah! I thought so. No matter. I shall be able to raise the money by pawning a picture to-morrow, no doubt. Thank you, all the same, Miss Pringle. And now, good morning.

Miss P. But — oh! — stay, Mr. Thompson, one moment. You won't — you won't say anything to Olivia, eh? You won't betray me, eh?

Mr. T. About the ten pounds? Why, my dear madam, if you haven't them in the house —

Miss P. No, no, no! — not that. Of course, if I didn't feel sure that with your talent you can easily raise any amount by your pictures, I — I would try and get you the money to-morrow. But of course I know that is absurd. No! I mean about asking you to — to —

Mr. T. Madam, we are fellow-conspirators; and I won't turn Queen's evidence: you may trust me. Good morning.

Miss Pringle, with a pricking conscience, made a nervous clutch in the direction of his hand, and rose from her sofa, and began a voluble valedictory address to her visitor.

But, avoiding the hand, he bowed low, and was gone — out of the house, and half-way down the Crescent, before Miss Pringle had turned and polished half the pretty things she meant to say.

How miserable he was, while indulging his grim humour at the spinster's expense, he himself alone knew. It had been the one thing in his desolate life — this intercourse with Olivia from week to week — to which he looked forward with intense eagerness. And that now must be lopped off! He was of no further use to her; and the old lady, amid all her absurdity, had said what he felt to be true, that his visits henceforward were more likely to do Olivia harm than good. He had observed how restless she seemed the last time he saw her; it was clear that his work in her behalf was done. She had no need of anything further; or, if she had, there was another ready to take his place, who would be more welcome, who had been long waited for, and despaired of, and reviled, and whose return would now be greeted like the prodigal son's — while he, the elder brother, who had never wasted his substance, might go back unmissed to the great Solitude of Life.

END OF VOL. I.

PRINTING OFFICE OF THE PUBLISHER.

Aïdé, Hamilton

The Marstons a novel

Bd.: 1

Leipzig 1868

P.o.angl. 6 p-4/5

urn:nbn:de:bvb:12-bsb10744573-1